H. Carville Lewis says in connection with the striæ on Cannon Hill, Kerry, Ireland: "At the present day the northwest winds are the wet winds. The winds were the same in the time of the local glaciers. The marks are so fresh that they may not be over 5,000 years old." "In Europe, likewise, numerous estimates of the lapse of time since the Glacial period, as collated by Hansew, are found to be comprised between the limits of 5,000 and 12,000 years."

Material comprising deposits of the Glacial age is very slightly oxidized and disintegration is very slightly advanced, even when said deposits occupy exposed positions. All this indicates that the lapse of time has not been long. The late Professor White, of the Pennsylvania Geological Survey, describes freshly preserved leaves at great depths which he found in terraces on the Monongahela River. He also describes a certain pebble which he found near the Big Sandy, and which is peculiarly liable to disintegration; nevertheless his specimens were in good condition.

Dr. E. Andrews, of Chicago, writes: "Seven thousand years may, with a good deal of confidence, be taken as the age of the lower part of the Niagara gorge. This, of course, does not take us back to the period when the front of the glacier lay in the headwaters of the Delaware and the Little Miami River, and when glacial floods were depositing the gravel at Trenton, N. J., and at Loveland and Madisonville, O., and where Drs. Abbott and Metz have found paleolithic implements; but it does bring us back to within a comparatively short distance of that period, the difference being merely the time necessary for the melting back of the ice from the summit of the Catskills to the southern flanks of the Adirondacks, and from the water-partings of the Ohio to the north shore of Lake Erie.

"A second typical place for the study of the recession of post-glacial waterfalls is presented in the gorge of the Mississippi River below the Falls of St. Anthony, at Minneapolis. The problem here presented has been carefully studied by Professor N. H. Winchell, the State Geologist of Minnesota, who thinks he can pretty closely approximate to the truth concerning its antiquity." The average arrived at for these calculations is 7,803 years.

*_The Zonal-Belt Hypothesis._ By Joseph T. Wheeler. A new scientific theory, calculated to strengthen the faith of those that half fear that nature as interpreted by science (God's creation) and the Bible (God's Word) are at variance. The author believes that our earth was girt by a system of Saturn-like rings. Genesis, to him, means what it says, and there was a division between the vapor-firmament and the firmament above the waters. Primitive man saw and worshiped these features. Half the book is given up to the interpretation of the echoes from these distant days. J. B. Lippincott Co. Pages 401. Price $2.50 net. By mail $2.65.

I Can Reduce Your Flesh Build Up Your Figure Correct Chronic Ailments

Would you like to accomplish these results by natural means and in a scientific, dignified manner?

I have helped over 20,000 women in the past six years by a few simple directions followed in the privacy of their own rooms.

Too Fleshy? I can reduce you and at the same time strengthen stomach and heart, and relieve you of such chronic ailments as:

Constipation	Rheumatism	Dullness	Sleeplessness
Torpid Liver	Weakness	Irritability	Weak Nerves
Indigestion	Catarrh	Nervousness	Weak Heart

I strengthen whatever organs are weak; start your blood to circulating as when you were a child; teach you to breathe so the blood is fully purified.

One Pupil Writes:

"Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I have reduced those hips and I feel so well I want to shout. I never get out of breath now. When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all so easy. I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

Too Thin? You can be round, plump, rested and attractive. Nature intended you to be, why should you not? A pupil who was thin writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I want it, and I carry myself like another woman. My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion any more, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested I feel so well all the time."

Write me today telling me your faults in health or figure, and I will cheerfully tell you whether I can help you.

Send 10 cents for instructive booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly.

New Plans for Raising Money

Does Your Church or Society Need Money

OUR PLANS ARE BASED ON BUSINESS PRINCIPLES, AND PRODUCE LARGE RESULTS WITH SMALL EFFORT.

ESPECIALLY DESIGNED FOR LADIES' AID SOCIETIES, MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS, SUNDAY-SCHOOL CLASSES, YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES, ETC.

No Obligations. Our plans involve no investment or other obligation. We furnish free all supplies. You may begin now and stop when you like.

No Begging. Our plans involve you in no begging scheme. By them you are enabled to give value received for the funds you raise. Of course, people should be trained to give, and we have provided for that, because our plans make people want to give more liberally, not only of money, but of time and energy, as well.

How Much Can You Raise? That depends somewhat on local conditions, the size of the town and the kind of people in it. The quickest methods draw from the local population and will bring in from $25.00 to $250.00 within a few days, according to the effort and number of persons engaged.

All May Help. Ordinarily the load is carried by a few of the faithful who are already overburdened. We tell you how to put everyone to work, and how to get the best results from each. One person may do it alone, if necessary. We have one man on our list, over seventy years of age, who raised more than $500.00 through using our plans.

Plans Sent Free. Our Booklet of Information will be sent free to anyone who makes application, telling us what the money is for and how much is needed. Simply send a postal and ask for "Modern Methods of Raising Money," and state what organization you represent, how much money you want to raise, and what for. You will be under no obligation to try any of our plans and will find the book helpful in forming your own plans in case you do not try ours.

NEW IDEA

Helped Wis. Couple.

It doesn't pay to stick too closely to old notions of things. New ideas often lead to better health, success and happiness.

A Wis. couple examined an idea new to them and stepped up several rounds on the health ladder. The husband writes:

"Several years ago we suffered from coffee drinking, were sleepless, nervous, sallow, weak, and irritable. My wife and I both loved coffee and thought it was a bracer." (delusion).

"Finally, after years of suffering, we read of Postum and the harmfulness of coffee, and believing that to grow we should give some attention to new ideas, we decided to test Postum.

"When we made it right we liked it and were relieved of ills caused by coffee. Our friends noticed the change — fresher skin, sturdier nerves, better temper, etc.

"These changes were not sudden, but relief increased as we continued to drink and enjoy Postum, and we lost the desire for coffee.

"Many of our friends did not like Postum at first, because they did not make it right. But when they boiled Postum according to directions on pkg., until it was dark and rich they liked it better than coffee and were benefitted by the change." "There's a Reason."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Æneas and Dorcas

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WHEN Peter was first called to be an apostle, and when he, as one of the twelve, received his vocation to "preach the Gospel," he was commanded equally to "heal the sick." Jesus said to them, "As ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand. Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out devils." And this command was substantially repeated after the resurrection.

There was a sick man in Lydda. We are not told how Peter found him out. It may be that God told Peter of this sufferer, and directed his steps to him. Eight years this poor man had kept his bed, afflicted with palsy. It would not be difficult to find out many who have been bedridden twice or three times as long; there is nothing so remarkable about his sickness. But Peter came to him as a man sent from God, and said to him:

"Æneas, Jesus Christ maketh thee whole; arise, and make thy bed."

Peter's commission was fulfilled; he could do no more. There was no power in him to heal the man; he must himself put forth faith. It was just as when we lead a sinner to Christ—we may put him in the way, we may show him how completely his salvation is a finished work, we may tell him he has but to claim it, letting go himself and his sins, but then we can do no more; we cannot break with his sins for him, we cannot take the step of faith for him; if he does not himself accept Jesus, he remains unsaved. Just so is it with healing—we may show a poor sick one how Jesus took his infirmities, and bore his sicknesses; we may show him the many blessed encouragements there are in the Word of God to put his case into the Lord's hands; we may pray over him and anoint him with oil in the name of the Lord; but unless he himself puts forth the hand of faith, we have no more power to heal him than we have to save his soul.

Æneas acted in faith; "he arose immediately." Wherever a sick one responds thus to the received command of Jesus, whether through the Word of God, or directly through the voice of the Holy Spirit, God honors his faith, and he is healed.

A well-known disciple among the little flock of Christians in Joppa fell sick and died. This was no small loss to the Church; for this dear woman "was full of good works and almsdeeds which she did." Had she lived in our day, she would not have held a mothers' meeting once a week, and helped a little in a mission just when everybody else was there, and it was so pleasant; afterward returning to a life of ease, comfort and self-indulgence. Dorcas was full of her vocation; she needed nothing from the world to fill up the interstices; she was full already; to serve Christ sufficed. She was not one of those who needed recreation; to her it was all holiday, because it was all for Jesus. It was a blessed life, and, no doubt, to die was gain to her. But, as in Paul's case, the Lord saw that for her to abide in the flesh was more needful for his little Church. The friends of the dead woman washed her, and "laid her in an upper chamber." No doubt many came to see the remains of one who gave herself unreservedly for God and for them; but, knowing that Peter was at Lydda, they sent two men to beg him not to delay to come unto them. He "arose and went with them," and they took him into the chamber of death. Sorrow and lamentation were there, and the good deeds of Dorcas were in the mouth of everybody. But Peter had a message from God, and he "put them all forth," and, like Elisha with the Shunamite's child, he was shut in alone with God and with the dead. He kneeled down and prayed, and he knew that he was answered, for "turning him to the body he said, Tabitha, arise. And she opened her eyes: and when she saw Peter, she sat up."

Our Pattern*

THE subject of this lesson is what, in the modern treatment of religion, is the meat and marrow of the whole.

Are you living for yourself alone, making yourself comfortable, ambitious to gain fame, money, popularity?

Our great Pattern cut himself off from comfort and from friends; despised gain of all kinds; thought only of helping men.

You see the rich man's home, its gorgeous furnishings, its pictures, its servants. You long to possess something like it. Its luxury appeals to your sense of beauty and your human weakness.

Our great Pattern had no home. The foxes have holes, but the Son of man had not where to lay his head. Instead of being waited upon by servants, he was healing the poor of their loathsome diseases and washing the feet of his disciples.

Are you aiming for social distinction? Do you wish to have it said that you move only in the "first circles"?

Our great Pattern consorted with publicans and sinners quite as much as with rich men and Pharisees. He was no respecter of persons. A man to him was simply a brother—one to be loved, and, if there were need, to be helped.

The value of an ideal for conduct is eloquently pictured by Dr. Jefferson in his noble sermon upon "Consecrated Personality." He is speaking of the theory that the character of races has been controlled chiefly by their physical environment.

"This," he says, "is a speculation which history shatters into a thousand pieces. Luther and Calvin have left a deeper mark on Europe than Vesuvius with his torch of flame, or the Jungfrau with her diadem of snow. Shakespeare has done more to tinge the feelings and shape the imaginations of the English people than all the waves that ever broke upon the coasts of their island home. Washington has done more to determine the character of American manhood than all the suns of all the systems of the Milky Way. Jesus of Nazareth, a carpenter, a teacher, without fortune, reputation or human learning, has done more to form the disposition and shape the ideals of the leading nations of the world than all the winds and ocean currents. The ideal toward which we move is a man."

It is a legend of that most saintly of all saints, Francis of Assisi, that he was so much in the Spirit with Christ, that even his body took on a likeness to his blest Master; so that when his brethren disrobed him to put his grave-clothes on him they found in his hands the print of the nails of Calvary, in his feet the unhealed scars of crucifixion, and in his side a wound still bleeding from the spear-thrust. This is only a beautiful, tear-compelling story, and yet it has a deep lesson.

You say, "I, too, have striven for months, for years, to be like the Master; I have prayed, I have studied his precepts, I have fought with all my strength, and yet I stumble and fall daily."

Dr. Banks illustrates this position by a story of Paganini. Somebody asked him, "How long does it take to learn the violin?" He answered grimly, "Twelve hours a day, for twenty-five years."

Since character is immeasurably harder to train than is muscle, some idea may be formed of the time required to make a Christian. But be not discouraged. You will always feel imperfect, unless you are a prig and a dullard. And yet, at the end, the Master may say, "Well done."

Liquor Laws*

THE overwhelming temperance wave which is sweeping over many portions of our land rejoices every Christian heart. State after State has fallen into line. Where "local option" has been provided for, the towns are doing nobly. In most sections, this kind of a statute is considered to work better than a "blanket law." In other words, it is generally found most effective, in this matter as in many others, to have each community, as it were, "build over against its own house."

Many years ago, a boy of six was walking with his mother when they passed an open saloon. Two men issued from this place, in the sight of the mother and son. One of the men was unable to walk straight. The other unsteadily supported him.

The child looked only half comprehendingly upon the shocking scene. He had been carefully guarded from a knowledge of sin and misery. His mother did not know that he even understood the cause of the condition of the drunken men upon whom he was gazing with frightened, dilated eyes. Suddenly he turned to her.

"Did they drink whisky, mamma?"

"I am afraid so, dear."

"Where did they get it?"

"In that saloon."

"Can't we shut the door, so that nobody can get in there any more?"

"No; that wouldn't be according to law."

The child pondered a moment. Then he raised deep, troubled, angry eyes to her face, and burst forth, "What's the matter with the law? Ain't there any Christians in Congress?"

Blindly, vaguely, the indignant little mind had struck the same wall against which the rest of us have beaten our heads in vain—"What's the matter with the law? Ain't there any Christians in Congress?"

In our climate, men in health do not crave and cannot bear so much of spirituous stimulant as in other countries. Dr. George H. Beard, in his work upon American Nervousness, comments freely upon this fact. Tea, coffee and tobacco also affect our people more than those of the moister and less electric climates beyond our oceans. There is less excuse for intemperance here than there.

There is also in our country a reason for abstinence from intoxicating drinks, which does not apply in most other lands. They have kings and "strong governments." A single man counts for comparatively little there; but here he is an important unit in the government. He cannot, without blacker guilt than devolves upon others, "play and dally with his music and his wine."

"Democracy," said Lowell, "is only an experiment"; but in it the deepest hopes of the world are bound up, and the American citizen must hold himself to the high duty of proving the experiment a success.

When the early abolitionists vowed to drive out slavery, the vast majority of our people said, "It cannot be done." The few who thought that it might be done, believed that the Union would have to go with it. But the little band pressed on—and God helped them.

When William the Silent was told that his defense of the Puritans was hopeless, he said, "I have made an alliance with the mightiest of potentates, the God of Hosts. If he wills, he can save us."

Let our lawmakers enter into this great alliance; and let all the people say, "Amen!"

Public opinion must be roused to enforce these laws. Let us do what we can to place both of these powerful influences on the right side.

NEARLY RESIGNED

But Held Position on Grape-Nuts.

An Oklahoma woman was saved from loss of health and position by change to right food. She says:

"The Spring of 1904 found me almost a nervous wreck from the use of improper food. I could not sleep nor eat anything but what it seemed that my stomach was on fire.

"I had the best medical advice I could get, but medicine did not reach my trouble. I was growing worse all the time until I was about to resign my position, a thing I could not afford to do.

"A friend brought me a pkg. of that wonderful food, Grape-Nuts, and asked if I ever tried it. I told her no. I had no faith in it, but to please her I promised to use the package before I decided what it would do for me.

"I ate nothing but Grape-Nuts and cream, three times a day and that awful burning in my stomach disappeared. I was able to continue at my work and gained 26 lbs. in three months. So I owe my health and position to Grape-Nuts."

Poultry Secrets Disclosed

Is this cock properly held? "Poultry Secrets" tells you how to carry fowls, and scores of secrets far more important and hitherto unrevealed.

WE OFFER to all poultry raisers the essential knowledge and secret methods of many of the most successful poultrymen of America. As a rule these secrets have been guarded with extreme care, for it is on them that the great successes have been built. They have cost years of labor and thousands of dollars. They will cost YOU only a trifle and a few minutes to write us.

How We Obtained These Secrets

Michael K. Boyer, our poultry editor, has had exceptional opportunities and the closest friendship with poultrymen all over the country. They have freely told him many of their most jealously treasured secrets, many others we have bought, and this scattered material, together with several of Mr. Boyer's own valued methods, has now been collected in book form. It must be clearly understood that every secret printed has been obtained in an honorable way.

Dr. Woods' Egg Food Secret

Dr. P. T. Woods authorizes the publication of his system for producing large quantities of sterile eggs for market. Every poultryman who raises eggs for market must know Dr. Woods' method to be up with the times, and every householder who supplies only his or her own table will appreciate an increased quantity of the highest quality eggs for table use.

Secret of Fertile Eggs

Boyer's secret of securing fertile eggs by alternating males we believe is worth $100 to any big producer of eggs for hatching, either for his own incubators or selling to others for fancy stock. It is something new, and the diagrammatic illustration furnished by Mr. Boyer makes the matter so plain that the novice can easily understand it. This system is already practiced or about to be introduced in many of the largest plants in the country.

Selecting the Laying Hens

Since the production of eggs is the very basis of the poultry industry, the ability to tell the laying hens in the flock quickly, without the aid of trap nests, will put dollars in your pocket. Do not keep on feeding the robber hens.

Here are a few more of the Secrets:

1 Secret of the Philo System.
2 Woods' secret of laying food.
3 Proctor's salt secret.
4 Mendel's chart of heredity.
5 Truslow's secret of high prices for ducks.
6 Hunter's secret of success.
7 Gowell's fattening secret.
8 Burnham's system of mating fowls.
9 Brackenbury's secret of scalded oats.
10 Secret recipes for chick feed; practically the same food as is now sold on the market at a high rate.
11 Secret of 200 eggs per hen per year.
12 Woods' secret of saving weak incubator chicks.
13 Secret of telling age of poultry.
14 Secret of preserving eggs—the only safe way.
15 Secret of celery-fed broilers.
16 Secret of fattening turkeys.
17 Incubator secrets.
18 Broody hen secrets.
19 An exposure of the methods employed by some fanciers to kill the fertility of hatching eggs.
20 Greiner's Corn Secret.

There Are Scores of Others

I. K. Felch's Mating Secret

Many years ago Mr. Felch, one of the best known figures in the poultry world, published his breeding chart, but later realizing its great importance and value to him, he withdrew it and kept the information to himself.

He now has given Mr. Boyer permission to use this system and it is included in this book.

The Secret of Feed at 15 Cents a Bushel

A enterprising poultryman has been advertising this secret for $5.00 and pledging those who buy it not to disclose it to any one else; It has, however, long been known to a few poultrymen, Mr. Boyer among them, and the method is fully explained in "Poultry Secrets."

So-Called "Systems" Explained

A number of "systems" and secret recipes have been and still are sold at high prices. Some are good, but not new; some are new, but of little value. Some are worth the money paid for them. Poultry Secrets gives the facts.

Of course we cannot go to the length of saying that all the information in the book is new to every one. It is said there is nothing new under the sun, and the Egyptians were hatching eggs by artificial heat centuries ago; but we do say that to the great majority of poultrymen these secrets are absolutely unknown.

We Will Pay $10.00 For Any Secret Not in the Book provided it is practical and valuable. If it is something both good and new, a check for Ten Dollars will be sent at once. In submitting secrets address all communications to the

Here is enough egg producing green food for 100 hens. Grown in January it costs five (5) cents. Poultry Secrets explains this secret and many others.

Poultry Department of Farm Journal

Farm Journal for thirty years has conducted a Poultry Department known the country over for the ability of its editors and the value of its contents. Besides this strong section, which of itself makes the paper valuable to every chicken owner, its other departments are ably conducted and widely quoted. It is the standard farm and home paper of the country, with already more than three million readers. It is clean, bright, intensely practical; boiled down; cream, not skim-milk. Its editors and contributors know what they are talking about, and can quit when they have said it. It is for the gardener, fruit man, stock man, trucker, farmer, villager, suburbanite, the women folks, the boys and girls. It is illustrated and well printed on good paper. It has not a medical or trashy advertisement in it. Its more than half million subscribers pay five and ten years ahead—a very remarkable fact.

Success of the Burpee Business in "Quality-Seeds"

For many years we have had the Largest mail-order Seed trade in the World.
This is an acknowledged fact—and THERE MUST BE A REASON FOR IT! There are other firms that issue more expensive catalogs and send out "drummers," while we are EXCLUSIVELY A MAIL-ORDER HOUSE. Therefore the reason must be in the QUALITY OF SEEDS delivered and character of service rendered. ☛ Do not use "Cheap Seeds," even if claimed to be "Just as Good!"

A Spray of BURPEE'S "APPLE BLOSSOM" SPENCER
Exactly Natural Size. Engraved from a photograph.

6 Packets for 25c

For 25c. we will mail one 15c. packet of Burpee's Apple Blossom Spencer as shown painted from nature on front cover of Burpee's Farm Annual for 1909; one liberal packet each of Burpee's White Spencer and Primrose Spencer, which sold last year at one cent a seed; one regular pkt. each of the crimson-orange Helen Lewis, and the exquisitely dainty "pink-edged" Florence Morse Spencer, together with a 15c. pkt. of the New Superb Spencer Seedlings—the first really fine mixture of this magnificent, gigantic, ruffled, Orchid-flowered race.

These six superb Spencers, together with our new Leaflet on culture, mailed for only 25c., five collections for $1.00.

Eight Elegant New "Standard" Sweet Peas

For 25c. we will mail one regular retail packet each of these Eight: The new flaked Prince Olaf and the richest dark navy blue, Burpee's Brilliant Blue; the "apricot and lemon" Sybil Eckford; the "peach blossom pink" Queen of Spain; the Gloxinia-flowered, mottled Helen Pierce; the fadeless scarlet Queen Alexandra; the orange-salmon Bolton's Pink, and a large 10c. packet of the unequaled Special New Burpee's Best Mixed Sweet Peas for 1909.

25c. buys either of the above collections, or $1 any 5 collections, mailed to separate addresses, if so ordered.

For 50c. we will mail both collections as above, together with your choice of a 15c. packet of either Burpee's King Edward Spencer, the greatest novelty in Sweet Peas for 1909, shown on colored plate in our catalog, the New Princess Victoria Spencer, so named by Royal request, or the gorgeous English St. George. Thus you obtain for 50c. fifteen of the finest new Sweet Peas, which purchased separately at regular prices would amount to $1.65!

We have been recognized for many years as American "Headquarters for Sweet Peas" and are determined to maintain this unique position.

Beautiful Flowers—Eight for 25 Cents!

Thirty years ago we originated the plan of offering each season a Gem Collection, containing a Fine Assortment of Choice Flowers for Only Twenty-five Cents. Still further "to encourage the beautiful," we have endeavored now to surpass all previous efforts.

For 25c. we will mail one packet each of all the following: Fordhook Favorite Asters, choicest varieties in unequaled mixture; White Hyacinth Candytuft, immense heads of splendid flowers; Dianthus Fordhook Favorites, all the best Chinese and Japanese Pinks; Burbank's New Eschscholtzia, the lovely bright-crimson California Poppy; New "Fuschia-flowered" Ipomoea, a most attractive, rapid growing climber (see illustration); Imperial German Pansies, fifty varieties in superb mixture; Petunia, "Brilliant Beauties," a special blend of Baby Rose, Adonis Rosy Morn, etc., and Burpee's Best Strain of Phlox Drummondii Grandiflora as grown at our famous Fordhook Farms.

PETUNIA "ROSY MORN"

25c. buys all the above 8 packets, which, purchased separately, (price 10c. each), would cost 80c.!

Seeds for the Children's Garden

No better collection than the above could be obtained to give to children. As our contribution we shall send with each collection ordered this season two extra packets Free, containing special mixture of Sweet Peas and Nasturtiums.

The Sweet Peas include Burpee's Best Mixed, together with Fordhook Fancy Flaked and "Spencer Seedlings."

The Nasturtiums will include all tall varieties—Burpee's Giant-Flowered, Madame Gunter Hybrids, Red Spurred Lobb's and a few of the Variegated-Leaved and New Ivy-Leaved.

These two special mixtures will be sent with every collection ordered, whether for one or one hundred.

Although Only "33 Years Old"

We Have Introduced More Novelties in Vegetables and Flowers that have become Standard Varieties of Recognized Value in the markets of the world than have any other three firms of American Seedsmen!

For 1909 we have decided to give planters generally (even those not accustomed to buy High-Priced Novelties) an opportunity to learn of the great advancement recently made in several choicest new Vegetables—at less than half our regular Catalog Prices for 1909.

Any "Four of the Finest" Novelties for 25 Cents!

Separately, the seven varieties named below are sold (excepting the last two) each at 15c. per pkt.; but you can select Any Four Varieties for 25c. (a silver "quarter" or five 5-cent stamps), while, if desired, we will mail All Seven Varieties for 40c., in cash or postage stamps. Separately, these seven packets at prices "per pkt.," would cost 95c.

Burpee's "Dwarf-giant" Tomato

The most meaty of all Tomatoes! The flesh is so firm and the tomatoes so heavy that they might be described "solid as a rock" It is the most nearly seedless of all tomatoes. Of handsome dwarf, erect growth, the bushes produce enormous crops of the most beautiful tomatoes which are truly gigantic in size and absolutely unequaled in delicious flavor. For full description and Colored Plate, also particulars of $437.50 in Special Cash Prizes for 1909, see Burpee's Farm Annual. Per pkt. 15c.

Fordhook Bush Lima. This is altogether unique. The only stiffly erect Bush form of the popular "Potato" Lima. Both pods and beans are twice the size of the Kumerle, while the "fat" beans are of the same delicious flavor as Burpee's Bush Lima. See illustration of a pod; for other illustrations, reports and description, see Burpee's New Farm Annual. Per pkt. 15c.; ½ pint 25c.; pint 45c.

Earliest Catawba Sweet Corn. At last we have found a rival to our famous Golden Bantam, both in extreme earliness and surpassingly delicious flavor. Several who have tested it at Fordhook Farms and in its home on Seneca Lake, N. Y., say it is even better than Bantam! For full description and special offer of $310 in Cash Prizes, see page 17 of Burpee's Farm Annual. Pkt. 15c.

Burpee-Improved Bush Lima. The earliest, largest and best of all Large Limas. The pods are truly enormous in size and borne most abundantly on vigorous upright bushes. Pkt. (two ounces) 15c. ½ pint 35c.; pint 60c., postpaid.

"Wayahead" Lettuce. So named because it is the earliest, most solid and surest-heading of all early "Butterhead" Lettuces. See illustration from photograph—"just as it grows"—below. Per pkt. 15c.

Fordhook Musk Melon. Heavily netted melons, nicely ribbed, with thick golden-red flesh of exquisite flavor. A better shipper than our original Netted Gem, the "Rocky Ford" Melon, and as sweet as our famous Emerald Gem! For painting from nature and full description, see Burpee's Farm Annual for 1909. Per pkt. 10c.; oz. 30c.

Burpee's Gibraltar Onion. Magnificent mild yellow globe onions, fully as large as the Prize-Taker and a better cropper! A great "money-maker" for the market and equally fine for the home garden. For illustration and description see page 72 of Burpee's New Farm Annual. Pkt. 10c.; oz. 25c.; ¼ lb. 70c.; lb. $2.25, postpaid.

40c. Buys all the above Seven Packets, or you can select one packet each of Any Four Varieties for only 25c., postpaid.

For $1.00 we will mail All the Seeds advertised for sale on this page, and give also any one 15c. packet of The Three New Sweet Peas named at bottom of first column—making in all 32 pkts. for $1.00. ☛ Not counting the two packets we give the children, the remaining 30 pkts., at regular retail prices, amount to $3.40—but all will be mailed to any address upon receipt of only One Dollar.

☛ Whether you are ready now to order any of the above or not, you should write TO-DAY for

Burpee's New Farm Annual for 1909

THE LONELY HERMITS OF MOUNT SINAI

By PROF. R. J. ROBINSON, Assiut, Egypt

IN the heart of the desert of Sinai stands the stately convent of St. Catherine, surrounded by massive walls, and with its rows of galleries, of hospitable guest-chambers, of cells, its important library of ancient manuscripts, its beautiful church, from the top of which the bells summon the faithful few in this desert waste to prayer. The banner of the cross floats high upon its topmost towers. Thus, with few and scarcely noticed changes, it has stood for centuries.

Its early history is difficult to trace. If we accept the legends and traditions of the place, it was built by the Emperor Justinian in the year 523 A.D. He erected the strong outer walls of granite, 20 to 30 feet high, and thus formed the irregular square inclosure 200 feet in extent. This he did because the hermits of Mount Sinai, so the old record runs, "when they heard that he delighted to build churches and found convents, made a journey to him, complaining how the wandering sons of Ishmael were wont to attack them suddenly, eat up their provisions, desolate the place, enter the cells, and carry off everything; how that also they broke into the church and devoured even the holy wafers." And so the place was fortified, and from its walls cannon frowned down upon the valley below, insuring protection to the religious devotees, who, in consequence, flocked thither in considerable numbers. The monastery grew and flourished. It contained between three hundred and four hundred inmates who, with patience and industry, transformed the granite sides of the mountain into well-ordered gardens and orchards. Princes and kings visited it, and endowed it with fields and wealth. Its richly decorated church was shortly erected and called the Church of the Transfiguration.

The fresh and more virile faith of Islam challenged the Sinaitic tribes to battle. It swept bare the adjacent land and carried away its inhabitants captive. But this wave of conquest did not interfere with the monks on Sinai. The centuries have affected the Convent of St. Catherine but little. Until a few years ago, it stood as it had done for a thousand years, the only Christian stronghold not only in Sinai, but in the whole of Arabia.

To this time the monks have remained undisturbed in their mountain fastness. Their numbers have dwindled to fifteen or twenty; but otherwise the inner constitution and the outer government of the monastery are in no ways different now from what they were a thousand years ago. The same rites have been performed and the same prayers uttered, day by day and night by night; the church and the mosque stand peaceably side by side; and behind them both rises up the "Mount of the Law," in whose shadow they stand.

The chief treasure of the place, to the existence of which much of its present-day fame is largely due, is the library, which contains about 1,000 manuscripts in Greek and Latin, besides many in Syriac, Ethiopic, Persian, Gregorian, Slavonic and Russian. Here, in 1844, was discovered by Professor Tischendorf the famous Codex Sinaiticus, a Greek manuscript of the Bible, dating from 400 A.D., and surpassed by the Codex Vaticanus alone in age and authority. It was purchased by Alexander II. of Russia for 800 francs, and now is in St. Petersburg.

The story of this find is a romance in itself. Thrown into a waste-basket, the contents of which were designed for the fire, it was rescued from this fate only to be securely locked away by the ignorant monks. Forty pages, however, were at this time taken away. Negotiations carried on for the next two years ended in failure. Only when the assistance of the Czar of Russia had been enlisted, and a royal edict given, did the monks admit scholars into the library or allow the use of the manuscript.

The most precious of the remaining volumes is the Syriac Codex, as it is called, the oldest known Syrian version of the Bible. A piece of laborious trifling, dating from the time of the Renaissance, is the whole of the Psalms written in microscopic characters on six leaves.

The Church of the Transfiguration is an early Christian basilica, and presents an interior not devoid of effect. From the ceiling hang a hundred antique lamps of silver and beaten brass, all different in size and shape; some are ornamented with ostrich eggs, others with silver doves, joining their wings in a circle and carrying the lights on their heads. The upper part of the apse is filled with mosaics of great beauty and value, which present exquisite workmanship and delicacy of finish.

A Native of Sinai

By far the most holy thing in the church is the "Chapel of the Burning Bush," to enter which one is required to take off his shoes, "for the ground on which he stands is holy." The room is about ten feet square. Against one wall is a little altar. Three silver lamps, always burning, hang inside, and a plate of solid silver is let into the floor below, to mark the site of the burning bush. This silver star was a gift from the Emperor of Russia.

The monks are under very strict monastic orders. They eat no meat nor other rich food; their fare is bread and water, along with fruit grown in the convent garden.

Because the monastery is unfortunately located, as far as the tourist world is concerned, it is rarely visited, even by those interested in holy places and historic sites. Few care to travel for a week or more across a waterless desert on camels, in order to visit the place; yet no one has ever returned sorry that he had gone.

A SERMON BY

Rev. Emory J. Haynes, D.D.*

"What Must I Do To Be Saved?"

TEXT—Acts 16 : 30, 31

THIS is an incident in connection with the founding of the Christian Church in Europe. Paul and Silas had preached that memorable sermon on the banks of that Thracian stream, which was the first utterance of the Gospel of Jesus Christ in Europe, that great land where to-day so many fanes and temples and gorgeous forms of marble and many precious stones rise to the glory of God in his houses of worship of many lands. And as a result of this preaching upon the river bank to Lydia and her company of women a church was formed. All those early churches were entertained in the homes of the converts, as was also pacticularly the case in the early history of Methodism. The church formed was held only in some dwelling place, some home of those who were converted by the preaching of these missionaries.

The Old-fashioned Gospel

How does it come back to me now—in those hills and valleys of Vermont, where my father preached—those sweet and solemn gatherings in the farm-houses, when benches were set up about the old gaping fireplaces, when the bronzed farmers came over the hills behind their sleighbells, the creaking of the snow about the doors, when the logs in the old fireplace sent up their leaping flames overhead and out into the evening air toward the stars, and my father stood in the midst of them with his hands within reaching distance of many a boy's head, of many a girl's head growing up about the knees of the pious folk of the homes, and in his unspeakable, homely and simple eloquence—so it seems to me, the rarest silver tongue that ever spake, whatever it may seem to others—he proclaimed to these people in the home the Gospel of Christ.

So it was in the early days of the Christian Church.

But this auspicious beginning was almost immediately interrupted by the rude arrest and incarceration of these followers of Jesus. You remember the circumstance. Here was a dancing girl, whose picture has come down to us on the canvas of several artists of modern times, the same Oriental dancing girl, her brain half swirling with insanity. A soothsayer, who told fortunes from straws picked from the street, and by many arts which made her living, and brought to her masters great gain when the hat went around among the gathered crowd at the end of her exhibitions. And now that she is restored again and become modest-faced and more beautiful than in her garish splendor, and folds her scanty robe about her and hides away and becomes a Christian woman, the hope of her masters' gain is gone, and in their anger they beset the men who had caused their loss, and thrust them into this prison.

That was the cause. It is always easier to do men harm than to do them good, and the world will pay you better far for harming it than for blessing it. One may sell rum and prosper by it. One will do his best to aid these great grinding trusts that shall wring the life out of the poor, and gain by it. But such is not God's way. Always it is true that any endeavor to do the world good is more or less beset with dangers and persecution.

In the Hands of the Jailer

This wretch that kept the prison knew that these men were innocent, but that was his business. He must have been at the court in the marketplace when they were brought in, and knew that they had done no harm, but had made a beautiful, dishonored peasant girl into a lovely, honest woman. Yet when the time came he turned the key, and led them into their imprisonment with all the ease and satisfaction that any other hireling of Satan does the business that is his business. When you hear the clang of those doors, you have no inkling of the tenderness of heart which cried out later: "What shall I do to be saved?" No, he was not stirred yet. All was fish that came to his net. May be there was a little bonus that came to him from these prisoners. He was simply a hireling of the Roman government. When these men were put down in the noisome inner prison, he slept as well on his iron bed as if no injury had been done by his hand. You would not think that a man like that would speak the word that would go down the ages as the cry of the penitent soul. Yet out of those stony lips were to come the penitent words which should serve as a text for many a preacher.

But not yet. He was a hard man. I had almost said I would like to speak to hard men, hard hearts to-night. They are multitudinous in this community. They grew up in Christian communities. They had no sentiment in boyhood. They had enough to eat and wear, and were sheltered, but there were no pictures on the walls, no books upon the tables, no thought of schooling, except the slender teaching of the common school, that might help the boy and girl to "get a living in the world." There was, least of all, any reading of the Bible, any thought of praise. It was a hard home, where all the teaching was, "Get all you can, and keep all you get." And the teaching of that home has come to be the pervading spirit of the man when he comes to Boston to start in to get a living, when he enters the bank, unsentimental, without any aspiration but to make money, looking at the eagle on the coin until it almost answers back, intending always to get his interest, not unjustly, never failing to give sixteen ounces, and three feet, but never giving any more; hard; and made hard by life, like the turnkey, carrying at his girdle the keys of thrift and economy, and no beautiful keys that turn the fairer doors of love, charity, faith, hope, sentiment. These men are in Boston all about me. I meet them every day, men who say of religion: "It is a thing for women; it is a thing for children; it is a thing for men who cannot take care of themselves."

One man said to me to-day, "Preach a hopeful sermon to the people, for there are some people who are discouraged and need help." As if this were the main purpose of the Gospel, to help those who are helpless in life, and it is so. But the hard man, who has come from the hills of New Hampshire, feels no need of help. He says: "I don't know what it means. I have got enough to last me while I live, and if my boys are thrifty, as I hope they will be, there will be enough for them and their children after them, and I have salted it well in the real estate of Boston. Nay, what do you mean by talking about this sentiment, this being saved?"

The Softening of the Hard Heart

I have seen, upon the top of Mount Washington, a grass growing that looks like wire. It has no flowers for many a long week. No storm is so severe that it kills the wire grass of Mount Washington. These hearts are like the wire grass. And yet I have seen in late September, before the snows fell on this wire grass, the smallest and yet the most delicate blossom, that came at length when the grass was softened, as out of the heart of this turnkey there came this word: "Sir, what shall I do to be saved?"

Then there are men who are made hard by the exigencies of life. They were thrust at and hit, and time has beat heavily upon them, and they have seen so much of suffering that they have become habituated to it, though they have not wilfully caused it. They have seen so much of cruelty that, though they would not be guilty of cruelty, yet they have become indifferent to the sore-heartedness of life. And these men, along about thirty or thirty-five years of age, turn to the world and say with a great consciousness of strength: "H'm, you can't break me; I will be iron, and you may grind at me, but you cannot crush me!"

I have seen on a neighboring green a dark stone, ferruginous stone, full of iron. You would never think that that was once a beautiful meteor across the evening sky, with the tenderest tints and rainbow colors, as it moved, all melted, until it fell upon the earth, a little aerolite. So these iron men, like the turnkey, if they could but be melted, would cry out as did he of old, "Sir, what shall I do to be saved?" And some of us, I hope, will bow at the feet of Jesus, as Paul and Silas told this man to do.

Then there are the wives of these men, a goodly company of them—and there used to be a larger number before we were given up to the enjoyments of luxury and wealth—who have grown up without much sentiment or poetry in their lives, whose grand object was to lay up money, to attend to household cares, to be thrifty, to add to the increment in the savings bank, who were much more anxious that their boys and girls should grow up to thrift than to learn a sweet line of Longfellow or Tennyson. Without actually suffering, well clothed and fed, kept in plain comfort, with the necessities of life supplied to them, and yet with no tears, no sweet aspirations over the name of Jesus. They do not pray. They dust and brew, they keep the house clean, they save the dollar, they teach their boys to do right and go along their way, and save and save and save, and be thrifty. Multitudes of women in older New England led this hard life, not a wicked life, but certainly not a spiritual life, and sent their boys and girls into the community without ever any concept that the softening of religion, prayerfulness, charity, aspirations towards the character of Jesus, a hope of heaven, had any place in the life. I have seen a little lump of clay taken from an English hillside, looking so dead and cold, as I held it in my hand, and yet it is possible that that little lump of clay can be made into Royal Worcester, as no other clay in the world can be, when it is touched by fire, and on it can be painted as on scarcely anything else in the world lovely colors and beautiful flowers. I would to God that out of your heart, good woman, whose whole life thus far has been simply an endeavor to be thrifty and make the best of this world, there should come the possibility of this cry: "Sir, what shall I do to be saved?" a consciousness that you are lost without the blessed Jesus.

The Song of Praise in the Prison

Now, see how it transpires in this story before us. Here these men are brought in, bound hand in hand, and they are dragged across through the common apartment where the ordinary prisoners are held in bonds, and through a little orifice in the floor are lowered down into the inner prison, a place of noisome miasms, of darkness, of wretched hours that creep so slowly along, a place of vermin, like the old Bastile. You may have seen somewhere in Europe the reproduction of this old prison, for it is to be found several times yet in France. There they lie, with their feet held fast in the stocks in this unnatural position, and while the hours go on and the keeper with his iron heart, and his keys at his side, lies sleeping on his cot, Paul and Silas, whose blood from their wounds, soaking through their garments, trickles down and adds its contribution to the noisomeness of their cell, suddenly begin to praise and sing psalms. Here is the very psalm they used to sing, that delightful Psalm, the 107th:

"Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men! Hungry and thirsty, their soul fainted in them. Then they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and he delivered them out of their distresses. And he led them forth by the right way, that they might go to a city of habitation. Oh, give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good!" And the prisoners began to awake. "Let the redeemed of the Lord say so, whom he hath redeemed from the hand of the enemy, and gathered them out of the lands, from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south."

Happiness Even in Adversity

And so they chanted on, that psalm, which every now and then has this refrain in the Hebrew tongue: "Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness to the children of men!" And Paul said: "Silas, do you remember how when Peter was in prison we prayed, and how in that little room at Jerusalem we called on God, and the angel of deliverance came?" And then there are words of prayer, sweet aspirations of praise, and the poor wretch who was the occasion of their victimization still sleeps on and is not awakened by this soft song. But the prisoners are wakened. And one by their side says: "I wonder why they are so happy?" One rude fellow, taken in from the hills, who was a murderer, says: "How can they be so happy?" And another and another rouse themselves to wonder how they can be so happy.

Now, sometimes the softening comes in this way. Sometimes the heroism of a Christian life which is undergoing suffering awakes the sympathy of those around one, who say: "He has something that I have not. What is it?" A friend of mine in a distant city, after a long term of prosperity, suddenly

THE WORLD'S MOST WONDERFUL SHIP

One of the Lounging-Rooms of the Liner

Children s Dining Room on the "Mauretania"

DURING the recent severe weather at sea, steamers eastward bound, and moving at greatly reduced speed, would see for a few moments the giant hull of a great ship, which drove forward like a racer, cutting through the rollers and sending as a result of the impact showers of spray well up toward her towering funnels, over a hundred feet in the air. It could be but one of two ships—the Lusitania or the Mauretania. It proved to be the latter, when, through the mist, the captains on their bridges could distinguish the letters of her name, and she was making a trip which would be considered another triumph added to the list she has already scored.

For two or three weeks the weather had been such that all ships were delayed, some being a day behind their usual run from Liverpool or Southampton to New York. The Mauretania, nevertheless, made a run which breaks previous records for a winter trip over the regular winter course. She made the transatlantic trip in four days, seventeen hours and six minutes, and her average speed was 25.55 knots per hour. One day she steamed 671 knots, which breaks all previous records. The total length of the winter course over which she came at such terrific speed was 2,890 knots. To do this she converted 1,000 tons of coal a day into ashes. It was coal from the mines of Wales. When the Mauretania smashed the record for the passage from America to England, American coal was burned. Speed means coal in extraordinary quantities. In fact, the coal put on board for one trip would fill twenty-two coal trains of thirty trucks each, if each truck carried ten tons. When the giant slows down, as she reaches port, and the fussy little tugs push and pull by the half dozen to get her up to the dock, she has very little of this supply left, and before she sails again the locality rumbles with the downpour of the "black diamonds."

On this great trip the ship showed she faced a strong westerly gale, and heavy swells every few moments rolled up against her bows. She hardly trembled under the pounding she received, but split the waves like a great knife. The passengers found it convenient, on the suggestion of the officers, to stay below. Only trained seamen would be able to get about with safety on deck when a steamer is engaged in the pleasant ocean pastime of breaking records against the onward rush of tons of water.

"Down below" on the Mauretania is as pleasant a place as one could wish to be while a storm is on, providing you have been out long enough to get on your sea legs. It seems more like a hotel than an ocean liner. Elevators run from floor to floor, telephones connect the different parts of the ship, and a wireless telegraph keeps the travelers in touch with the world over thousands of miles of water.

The main halls of the liner and public rooms are decorated with carved and gilded wood and Italian marbles, and easy chairs and lounges are placed about as in a drawingroom. Fires crackle cheerfully in the different fireplaces. During the winter months she has not had such a crowded passenger list, but she can accommodate 500 first-class passengers, 500 second-class and 1,300 third-class. To sail the ship and look after the varied wants of the ocean voyages there are 70 officers and men in the sailing department, 390 in the engineer's department, 350 stewards, and 50 cooks, besides the band and a good sized company of telephone and telegraph operators, printers and various attendants—a total of 800 to 900 people make up the crew—equal to an average regiment of infantry.

There are nautical experts who are watching for the time when this queen of the seas can further reduce the time between Europe and America.

saw everything taken from him in that awful destructive Black Friday, saw everything go to the wall. The next day another friend of mine went over to the office and saw this man who had lost his fortune, found him smiling, cheerful and happy. "How can you be so happy?" said he; "I came in to offer you my help." He said: "I am glad of your help, but nothing in this world can take away from me my peace of mind in God." The other man, not a Christian, went over the ferry, and said to himself a hundred times as he went up from the ferry through Fulton Street: "He has got something that I have not got." And I can see now how this manufacturer of glass was converted to his Christ. I see him walk the aisles of the church and say: "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?"

While the praise of Paul and Silas has softened and saved the other prisoners, it did not soften and save the man in his iron bed. So God sent another warning, and spoke in the thunder, and this great pile of masonry shook and trembled, and the stones began to chew their cement and send it out as if it were foam, and there began to be displayed huge holes in the work that Roman hands had piled for years and years to stand, and all was open to the day, and the gate that was to keep them in stood sagging open, and no one was to shut it. And so the jailer thinks to commit suicide, thinking the prisoners have fled. That is the common way, the way of desperation, when the hard heart comes to its trial beyond its powers. He is alarmed, no doubt. Something terrible has happened to him, and it has happened in a way that it has never happened before, and he is frightened. So, occasionally, I see the hard man fearful. Occasionally I meet him and find that he is distressed, anxious and afraid. But even then he is not willing to look to Him who is the power and help, but he thinks of some desperate thing.

Just as this man is about to fall upon his sword, Paul says: "Do thyself no harm!" "What, are they gods? How could they know that I was about falling on my sword? And they have not escaped! They must be gods. That is what has tumbled down these walls. I have done wrong. The gods are against me." He begins to soften now with fear. Fear is healthful, sometimes. People say, "You cannot frighten me into religion." I don't know that we can, but I know that the time will come when you will be frightened into religious thought. If fear is not wholesome, then the law of the land is without prevention. It can only arrest and punish. There are multitudes of things of which I am afraid. I am afraid of poison. I am afraid of deep waters, I am afraid of a scuttled ship. I am afraid of dishonest men. I am afraid of a painted woman. I am afraid of many things that might destroy me, and that fear keeps me.

This man was afraid, and it was wholesome fear. Are you not afraid to live as you are living now, day after day, with no conscious union with your God, his wrath impending over you?

And so he comes in, trembling with fear. I would to God that this city might be afraid of the wrongs so many are doing. I would to God that every hand that is lifted in some brothel to tempt a brother or harm a sister might be so frightened that it would fall harmless. I would to heaven that every soul that is appointed to die unrepentant might say, "Now, Lord, I am afraid!"

And he fell down, and Paul spake kindly to him. Ah, that sweet word of Christ always comes kindly. If Paul had commenced to accuse him, I think the man would have defended himself. Out of the heart of this hard man there came this cry: "I am wrong; what shall I do? I have done all wrong, although I knew that they were innocent, and yet I was deaf to their cry. I lent my hand to hurt them. I have transgressed. Oh, yes, I take it to myself. I do not defend myself now. Sirs, what shall I do to save myself?" In his own heart was the sense of guilt. He himself felt that he was wrong, and he wanted to be saved from it.

I told you that the wire grass on Mount Washington, though late it came to the flower, had the sweetest flower. I told you that the lump of iron in the yard yonder was, when glowing in the skies, beautiful. I told you that the gray lump of clay could be made into the most beautiful china. And you, sinner, lost to your highest sense, lost in the sight of God, have the making of sainthood.

Paul spoke of Jesus to this jailer, explained all to him and his family. They bowed down unostentatiously. They accepted this word; they are to be yonder. They looked and lived.

Good neighbors, let us do it to-night. Multitudes of hard hearts, thrifty men, oh, yield this thrift, and acknowledge that with all your getting you have not the pearl of great price. And may the peace of God come to you as it came to this great Roman, who yonder ministers sweetly, I have no doubt, at the foot of the throne, among the multitudes of little children whom you and I have sent there. For it is said that "unless one repent and become as a little child, he cannot enter in."

WELCOMING HOME THE FLEET

Our Big Battleships Greeted at Hampton Roads After Their 42,000-Mile Cruise

THE "BATTLE LINE" OF THE FLEET AS IT LEFT HAMPTON ROADS UPON ITS LONG 42,000-MILE CRUISE

ANOTHER has been added to the list of notable days in American history. It is the day of the return home, in peace and safety, of our big battleship fleet from its unparalleled cruise of 42,000 miles around the world.

On Monday, February 22, a thick morning mist lay along the shore waters off Hampton Roads. Great multitudes of visitors had come to Norfolk, Old Point Comfort and Fort Monroe, awaiting the arrival of the fleet.

At 10 A.M. the watchers, who were scouting about in tugs and launches, saw a few specks on the hazy horizon and the word was passed that the fleet had been sighted. Soon the vessels were more distinctly outlined and their number grew until, within half an hour after first sighting, they could be fairly distinguished.

Leading all the others came the Connecticut, Admiral Sperry's flagship. It was an inspiring sight, in spite of the weather conditions, as the big warships, in fighting formation, passed through the Capes, and, with guns booming their salutes to the President's yacht, the Mayflower, came up to their anchorage under the shelter of Old Point Comfort. The flagship, with Rear Admiral Sperry and Captain Osterhaus standing on the bridge, led in this cannonading, and as it passed down along the line the booming of the guns was almost deafening.

The President's yacht Mayflower had come down from Washington with a large party aboard, which included, besides the President and Mrs. Roosevelt, the Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Truman H. Newberry; Robert Bacon, the Secretary of State; the Assistant Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Herbert L. Satterlee, Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge, Miss Ethel Roosevelt, Miss Newberry, Miss Isabel Hagner, Commander William S. Sims, the President's naval aide, and Mrs. Sims; Captain Archibald W. Butt, military aide to the President; Kermit Roosevelt and Quentin Roosevelt. The President wore the silk hat and frock coat of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. Near the Mayflower was the United States dispatch boat Dolphin, with the members of the Naval Committee of the Senate and the House of Representatives. Behind her was the United States lighthouse tender Myrtle, in which were the Secretary of Commerce and Labor and Mrs. Straus, their son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Hochstadter, of New York; Theodore L. Weed, chief clerk of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and others. A big fleet of all kinds of craft followed the Mayflower out to her anchorage. The steamer Washington carried about 300 Senators and Representatives, with their wives and daughters. There was also a great fleet of unofficial craft. Every steamer and tug was decorated with signal flags and bright bunting.

Even when the Connecticut had finished her twenty-one guns (the salute to which the President of the United States was entitled from each ship) the other armorclads still kept up the cannonade. What with the battleships and forts together, it is estimated that over 2,000 guns were fired in all.

A squadron of torpedo boat destroyers kept well alongside the fleet to keep the way clear as they came in and to ward off trespassers. The battleships maintained a uniform distance of 400 yards apart, and the precision of the line excited general admiration. This is the order in which they passed the Mayflower in review:

Connecticut, Rear Admiral Sperry commanding.

Kansas, Capt. Charles E. Vreeland commanding.

Minnesota, Capt. John Hubbard commanding.

Vermont, Capt. Frank F. Fletcher commanding.

Georgia, Rear Admiral Richard Wainwright.

Nebraska, Capt. R. F. Nicholson commanding.

New Jersey, Capt. William H. Southerland commanding.

Rhode Island, Capt. Joseph B. Murdock commanding.

Louisiana, Rear Admiral Seaton Schroeder.

Missouri, Capt. Robert M. Doyle commanding.

Ohio, Capt. Thomas B. Howard commanding.

Virginia, Capt. Alex. Sharp commanding.

Wisconsin, Rear Admiral William P. Potter.

Illinois, Capt. John N. Bowyer commanding.

Kearsarge, Lieutenant-Commander Nathan C. Twining commanding.

Kentucky, Captain Walter C. Cowles commanding.

The home escort for the returning fleet included the following battleships:

Maine, Rear-Admiral Conway H. Arnold.

Idaho, Captain James M. Holm commanding.

Mississippi, Captain John C. Fremont commanding.

Montana, Capt. Alfred Reynolds commanding.

New Hampshire, Capt. Cameron McR. Winslow commanding.

North Carolina, Capt. William A. Marshall commanding.

The big ships were a beautiful sight. They came slowly to anchorage in the harbor in double line, amid the screeching of salutes from hundreds of steam craft of every description. Then, after some delay, a launch bearing Admiral Sperry set out from the flagship, conveying the commander of the fleet to pay his respects to the President. Presently, the Mayflower hoisted a signal directing flag officers and commanders to come aboard, and soon the bay was alive with little launches. President Roosevelt welcomed the commanders on the Mayflower's deck and shook each by the hand. They were then led to the cabin, where luncheon was served. The President made a brief address, welcoming the fleet and paying a high tribute to its efficiency and to its officers. Rear-Admiral Sperry replied, saying that when the fleet left San Francisco the President had laid a great responsibility upon its officers and men, and he thought the responsibility had been faithfully discharged and that the capabilities of the crews in every direction had been largely increased. The battle efficiency in gunnery had been doubled.

There was more speech-making, and soon thereafter the officers returned to their own ships, only the flag officers remaining on the Mayflower. These, with the President and his party, a little later took a steam launch and went aboard the Connecticut, where the President shook hands with Captain Osterhaus and the line of commissioned officers. Mr. Bacon, Secretary of State, and Mr. Newberry, Secretary of the Navy, did the same. The President then made his formal address of greeting to the fleet. After reviewing the voyage, he said:

"As a war machine, the fleet comes back in better shape than it went out. In addition, you, the officers and men of this formidable fighting force, have shown yourselves the best of all possible ambassadors and heralds of peace. Wherever you have landed you have borne yourselves so as to make us at home proud of being your countrymen. You have shown that the best type of fighting man of the sea knows how to appear to the utmost possible advantage when his business is to behave himself on shore, and to make a good impression in a foreign land. We are proud of all the ships and all the men in this whole fleet, and we welcome you home to the country whose good repute among nations has been raised by what you have done.

"This is the first battleship fleet that ever circumnavigated the world. Others may do it, but they must follow you. You did the trick."

There was a great deal of cheering, and when it had subsided the President and his party visited the Louisiana, where the same honors were rendered and enthusiastic speeches made. Mr. Roosevelt told the officers and men how proud the nation was of what had been accomplished. He visited in turn each of the flagships, and when all the formalities were over and the big battleships and guns had again saluted each other thunderously, and all had saluted the President, the Mayflower gave a parting salute of thirteen guns to the Admiral of the fleet and then steamed off for Washington. In the evening the big ships were all illuminated and a night of festivities followed the day of joyous greetings and congratulations.

It was a somewhat stormy homeward voyage, rough weather being experienced most of the way across the Atlantic. Hundreds of messages from wives, sweethearts and relatives awaited the men of the fleet on their arrival. Thousands of friends and dear ones were waiting for them in person, nearly all having come long distances for the purpose. And when the men finally got ashore, after three days of coaling and cleaning ship, they were at once surrounded and welcomed in a way that made spectators envious. There was consolation in the warmth of these home greetings to the poor fellows who had been away for a whole year and who were now regarded as real heroes by their kinsfolk and friends. And heroes they were, not only in their friends' estimation, but in that of the whole country. Not only had they broken all records for a naval voyage, but their conduct, and indeed the general morale of the entire fleet, had been exceptionally fine. Not a complaint was made against a single "jacky" on account of misbehavior, afloat or ashore. They had been a credit to the Navy and to the nation.

President Roosevelt Addressing the Officers and Jackies on the "Connecticut"

On Tuesday, February 23, Rear-Admiral Sperry and the other officers of the fleet were given a reception at Richmond, Va., when Governor and Mrs. Swanson and a large number of State officials and prominent people extended to them a rousing Virginia welcome.

Admiral Sperry, responding to an address of greeting, paid a high tribute to his naval officers and men.

"On the world's cruise," he said, "I have had about me a splendid corps of officers. Of my personal staff of seven men, six are sons of the South. Georgia, Florida, South Carolina, all are represented among my personal aids, while my old 'Sour Apple State' of Connecticut is left out entirely. With these men at the wheel, is it any wonder that we have gotten here and have gotten here on time?"

He assured his hearers that the voyage had been no "junketing party," but a serious and successful attempt to increase the fleet's efficiency. "Now that the world is governed by the people and for the people," he said, "it is not sufficient that a solitary arbitrary ruler should know on paper the possibilities of a contest and the questions at issue. Under the constitutional forms which rule the world to-day, even in Russia, public sentiment may force a ruler into a war or keep him out of it. And it is necessary, if you desire the peace of the world, that you show your fleet."

The Fleet's Welcome Home

IT was a glorious greeting that awaited our big battleships, their admirals, commanders and crews at Hampton Roads, after finishing their globe-circling cruise. Their return in splendid trim, after a 42,000-mile voyage, with forces unimpaired and laden with messages of peace and international good will, was something of which the nation might well be proud.

But our fleet has done better than merely break all previous records for sea voyages. It has accomplished more than a hundred embassies could have done in advancing the national prestige and bringing us into closer and friendlier contact with the other peoples of the globe. It has already been a potent factor in improving our diplomatic relations with the South American republics, and Rear-Admiral Sperry's visit to the Orient may yet prove to have an influence on future developments in China and Japan as far-reaching as that of Commodore Perry, whose black-hulled wooden squadron entered Yeddo some fifty-six years ago.

It was appropriate, too, that the last task of our warships, before entering on the long home-stretch across the Atlantic, should have been a mission of humanity and helpfulness to stricken Italy. Thus the great naval pageant, which originated in the clever brain of the Hon. Victor H. Metcalf, Secretary of the Navy two years ago, began and ended in peace and good will to all the world. It has given us a larger and higher place among the powers of the earth. It has broadened our naval experience, and, in the expressive language of Admiral Sperry, "has created the fleet." What was before simply a huge and costly machine, with vast but untried possibilities, has by that voyage been transformed into a mighty mobile organization, unrivaled in trained efficiency, perfect in discipline. Further, 87 per cent. of the crews are American born and 95 per cent. are American citizens. With such men and such ships, the glory and honor of the nation may safely be trusted.

The Suffragists at Albany

UP to the present time, the suffrage movement in this country has been marked by none of the extreme and absurd features which have characterized it in England. Our champions of the vote for women have been in the main courteous, dignified, serious. Their most weighty advocates during recent years have been drawn from among the social and philanthropic workers. These are nearly a unit in pleading that the ballot be granted to women. On the other hand, the opponents of the measure belong almost uniformly to the well-to-do classes, living in comfortable homes, amply protected by fathers or husbands, and needing no help from the law.

The women of New York may well be proud of the representatives of their sex who stood before the Judiciary Committee of the State Legislature at Albany, on February 24, to urge that the suffrage question should be submitted to the entire Legislature for a vote. Among them were Mrs. Villard, inheriting from her father, William Lloyd Garrison, her hatred of injustice; Miss Shaw, a brilliant speaker and one of the noblest and best of women; Mrs. Crossett, gentle, domestic, pleading especially for the ballot as a protection to the home; Mrs. Florence Kelley, whose quiet work among women toilers has won her the respect of the world; Mrs. Ivins, Miss Draper, and the score of other women well known in our prominent social circles, who know how much the vote in the hands of women would do to purify society; and, perhaps most ardent of all, Mrs. Graham, the president of the New York State W. C. T. U. Every liquor seller in the world is probably against woman suffrage. The "temperance women" realize what that means.

An anti-suffrage delegation of women was also heard at Albany on the same day upon which the suffragists presented their plea. Both sides were earnest and eloquent, but the pro-suffragists distinctly carried the day. They are encouraged by the hope that their resolution may now get out of committee and be submitted to a vote.

In Massachusetts a greater interest than ever before is shown in this burning question. Led by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe and Miss Alice Stone Blackwell, and many chivalrous and devoted men of high character, they may succeed in their long efforts, in advance of any other Eastern State. In Massachusetts, it is said, more ministers are in favor of woman suffrage than in any other State. They realize that by it the power of the Church would be greatly strengthened.

From the State of Washington comes the news that the Governor has signed the suffrage bills, providing for an election in November, 1910, to decide whether women shall be allowed to vote. Verily, the women's battle goes merrily on!

A Practical Field of Philanthropy

IN November last there was held in New York City a Tuberculosis Exposition, which attracted much attention, not only from the physicians and philanthropists who had been making the subject a study, but from the public as well. People came by the tens of thousands to see the exposition and listen to the explanations of the guides. Since that time a number of efforts for an organized fight on the plague have been started, with help from the earnest men and women who now realize that the prevalence of the disease causes more deaths than wars and famines combined. In fact, the only hope of stamping out the disease lies in the co-operation of all classes for securing more sanitary dwellings and the enforcement of sanitary laws. The disease can be stamped out by determined effort and large numbers of the afflicted completely cured by using the means, so well shown at the exposition, of rest, proper food, and, above all else, breathing pure air.

One great practical result has already come from the suggestions made. Our present tenement and apartment houses are prolific breeders of the disease, and, acting with the advice of competent experts, Mrs. Vanderbilt, of New York, has given a million dollars to build a number of apartment houses which will have none of the objectionable features now common. These are to be exclusively for people affected by the disease.

Dr. Henry L. Shively, the noted tuberculosis expert, is in charge of the construction. The buildings will pay their rent and be self-supporting. The tenants will be selected by physicians from families who have members convalescent from the disease, so that when they return from the sanatoriums they will not have all the good they received undone by the poor surroundings which developed tuberculosis.

It is a practical philanthropy, and opens a new field for those who are looking for some decisive way to help the race. It is to be hoped that Mrs. Vanderbilt will find many imitators, not only in her own city, but elsewhere, for consumption has no regard for geographical boundaries, as have some of the ills to which mankind is heir.

The Little Kindnesses of Life

ONE of Tolstoi's most beautiful stories tells of a poor old Russian villager who, believing that Christ would soon come back to earth, began to look for him daily. It was the winter season and snow lay over all, while bleak winds swept the streets. Sitting in his humble room, the aged rustic heard a knock at his door. He opened it, and a wretched traveler, unprepossessing, ragged and bedraggled, entered. He warmed and fed him, giving him the seat nearest the little fire and the last of his slender provisions. Wearied with his vigil and deeply disappointed, he sat half asleep beside the stranger, when suddenly a halo filled the room and the figure of Christ seemed to stand before him, and told him that He was the outcast whom he had fed and sheltered. When he aroused himself the stranger had gone.

This little story points a moral which should appeal to every Christian heart. In the need of those around us who are buffeted by misfortune; in the many instances that daily arise wherein we can serve others without hope of reward; in the poor, the unemployed, the sick, the prisoner, the maimed; yea, in the veriest tramp and outcast, we may recognize, if we will open our spiritual eyes, something of the Christ-likeness. Every opportunity of doing good to others, every impulse to a noble, unselfish act, comes from this source. So we may be assured no good deed is ever lost, no kindness ever wasted, no generous self-denial ever exercised in vain. Nor is any object so insignificant or so mean as to be unworthy of our sympathy; for He who said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto me," had a heart full of boundless love and pity for the sorrowful, the suffering and the unsuccessful, and turned none away. If we would cultivate the Christ-heart, we must learn not to despise the little opportunities, for it may happen that in so doing we neglect the things that are the very essence of Christian life and character.

An Impossible Task

AN epigram that fixes itself in the mind may accomplish more for the cause it represents than long pages of argument. Thus, the Cross of Christ has been very aptly called "the stumbling-block of the New Theology," and the statement is literally true. These reconstructive theologians, while accepting Jesus as a great teacher and even as quasi-divine, insist that his philosophy—not his works, his miracles or his sacrifice on Calvary—is what concerns us. What the human race needs, they tell us, is enlightenment to free men from the bondage of ages of superstition. They must lift themselves, en masse, up from the depths of ignorance. They are advised to attach no importance to the story of a race sunk in sin, the path to whose redemption has been opened by God's plan of divine love and atonement. As to the message of inspiration, and the way of salvation, it is to such teachers what it was to the ancient Greeks—foolishness.

Such teaching confuses sociological and spiritual things. It is utterly incapable of reaching the heart and transforming the life. If Nicodemus had applied to some such adviser, he would never have learned of the new birth. It is simply a case of men who are themselves unfortunately still in spiritual darkness, yet who profess to enlighten others. The moment one of our new theologians takes hold by faith of the real Gospel truth, that moment he will become emancipated and will have his eyes opened to what the Christian religion really means. He will understand something of its tremendous power over the hearts and lives of men and women and why people hold it as the most precious of their possessions and are willing to suffer and even to die for it. Until we attain to the truth ourselves, it is impossible to convey it to others.

GREATNESS OF THE BIBLE

"As a mere literary monument, the English of the Bible remains the noblest example of the English tongue."—JOHN RICHARD GREEN.

"There is no book in the world like it. The finest books ever written fall far short in interest of any one of the stories it tells."—HALL CAINE.

"If there is anything in my style or thoughts to be commended, the credit is due to my kind parents in instilling into my mind an early love of the Scriptures."—DANIEL WEBSTER.

"Whatever greatness there has been in any thought of mine, has been simply due to the fact that, when I was a child, my mother read daily with me a part of the Bible and made me learn a part of it by heart."—JOHN RUSKIN.

How China's Emperor Died

THE death of the Empress Dowager and the Emperor of China at so nearly the same time caused widespread suspicion throughout the world that there had been foul play, and the general impression was that the Emperor had been murdered. Some claimed that a native physician had received an immense amount of money for poisoning him. The Revue, of Paris, upon what it declares to be good authority, has revealed the secret of that foul play. It appears that when the Empress Dowager realized that her end was near she convoked the Grand Council, and it was decided that, as the Emperor had no male child, the infant son of his younger brother, Chun, should be named successor, with his father as regent. When the Council had dissolved, the Empress Dowager summoned Yuan Shi Kai, the Emperor's most deadly foe, with Prince Tsing, the head of the imperial family and chief of the eunuchs of the palace. As the result of their meeting, it was announced that the Emperor was dangerously ill from heart disease, and the offers of the foreign legations to send their doctors was courteously but firmly declined. The next morning Prince Tsing, with two eunuchs, went to the Emperor's palace and told him that the Empress Dowager was about to die, and that the good of the country required his preceding her to the shades. He emphasized his opinion in a dramatic way by placing on a table a box of opium pills, a piece of gold leaf and a red silk braided cord, saying that he would return in three hours, and that, if the Emperor had not put an end to his life with the opium or the gold leaf, his two assistants would be under the necessity of putting the red silk cord around his neck and strangling him. To have removed himself with the gold leaf, it would have been necessary for him to put it over his mouth and inhale it with a strong breath, obstructing the glottis and causing immediate suffocation. Heavy guards, unfriendly to the prisoner, left no opportunity for escape. He took the opium pills, and when Prince Tsing returned he found him in his last long sleep. At five o'clock the Emperor Kwang Su died, and the three-year-old Pu Yi was at once brought to the imperial palace and proclaimed Emperor. The Empress Dowager Tsi-An could now die in peace, which she did twenty-four hours later, and now the world witnesses the farce of a three-year-old baby ruling over 400,000,000 souls.

No tragedy in kings' palaces of ancient or modern times has been more cold-blooded than the removal of the Chinese Emperor. There has been a great deal of killing of rulers, even in our later civilized times. Our own free, glorious government has suffered the death of three great and beloved Presidents by the assassin's hand. But for a woman, who held the destiny of one-fifth of the population of the globe in her hand, in the face of whatever accountability awaits mortals, after having incarcerated her nephew, the real ruler of the nation, for so many years, to spend her last moments on earth plotting the murder of that nephew is a spectacle as unusual as it is shocking to behold. Such a deed may not shock the ethics of thousands of years ago, nor of China to-day; but it is very much out of harmony with the standards of our present Christian civilization.

And Zimri went in and smote him, and killed him, in the twenty and seventh year of Asa king of Judah, and reigned in his stead. (1. Kings 16 : 10.)

Fatal Swim for a Pocketbook

When the American liner St. Paul struck the British cruiser Gladiator recently, and sunk her, many of the passengers on the fated vessel swam to the land, which was not far away. One of these, remembering that he had left his pocketbook, containing $150 to $200, on the ship, swam out to the vessel to get it. Whether he reached the ship or got the money is not known, but it is certain that he never came back alive to the land. His act seems a piece of folly, and yet he is an illustration of large numbers of persons who risk their lives for material possessions and who imperil their souls in their anxiety for the accumulation of wealth. The acquisition of money by just methods, and its use for practical and benevolent purposes, can be made a means of grace, but the accumulation of means by fraud and its use for bad purposes or hoarding it away for its own sake is a great detriment to the character. In the sea of spiritual life so many lose their souls swimming after their pocketbooks.

For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? (Matt. 16 : 26.)

Fatal Prick of a Pin

Hugh Butler, manager of the bond department of a house on Wall Street, New York, died in the hospital at Mineola recently, from blood poisoning. He was engaged in his favorite game of golf on Lincoln's Birthday, making the rounds of the Salisbury links, when he struck his mouth a slight blow with one of his clubs. He continued his game, and a small pimple formed on his lip. This he pricked with a pin. His lips commenced to swell rapidly, and in a few hours were twice their normal size. An operation was performed, but his life could not be saved.

Death lurks in the point of a pin, in the sting of an insect, in the cold north wind and in the summer heat, in the drop of water, in the petal of the flower, and everywhere; and the only thing for men and women to do is to fill up every living moment with patient, earnest, devoted service for God and our fellow-men. The best preparation for death for young or old, whether it come by accident or slow disease, is duty faithfully performed out of love for the One who gave his life for us.

Be ye also ready : for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh. (Matt. 24: 44.)

An Elephant Teetotaler

Animals do so many strange things nowadays entertaining children and the students of nature. An elephant at the Bronx Park, New York, catches pennies and nickels in his trunk as they are tossed to him by the crowd surrounding his cage, and reaching up his trunk puts them in a little bank, where they ring a bell as they descend into the chest. Jule, an elephant in Central Park, New York City, celebrated Washington's Birthday in a peculiar manner, not by indulging in any kind of intoxicating liquor, but by taking large and constant draughts of pure, sparkling water. The hydrant outside of Jule's cage had a round handle, but on the morning of the 22d of February one of the ordinary T shape was installed, and also a new spigot. Jule studied the new mechanism with care, and finally, after much fumbling, turned it with her trunk and induced a flow of water. She placed her trunk under the stream and drank a copious draught. When she had drank to her satisfaction, she turned off the water and returned to her bundle of hay, and all through the day when thirsty she would turn on the water, drinking and turning it off again, to the amusement and delight of the spectators.

The many persons who celebrate our national holidays, including the anniversary of Christ's birth, in reckless conviviality and intemperance, might learn a good lesson from Jule the elephant, who celebrated simply with cold water. Water is necessary to all kinds of life, vegetable and animal, and because that is the case the Scriptures frequently use it is a symbol of spiritual love, which is the life of the soul.

Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely. (Rev. 22 : 17.)

Costliest Rug in the World

H. H. Topayan, a wealthy Armenian connoisseur, presented to the American Government through the President, recently at the White House, one of the most costly rugs ever made. It is a superb imperial, silk-jeweled Persian rug, valued at $50,000. It contains twenty-four square feet of pure Persian silk, studded with sapphires, rubies, emeralds and turquoises, surrounded by ropes of pearl, causing the color design, which is modeled after the interior of a Turkish mosque, to run into delicate shades of rose, green and horizon blue. The rug, which is hand-woven, represents the labor of an entire Persian family for five years. It was originally intended for use as a wall tapestry in the palace of the Shah of Persia, but the owner, after considerable trouble, succeeded in purchasing it. A framework of mahogany has been built around the rug, and it may be used as a hanging tapestry in the White House reception room.

This act of generosity toward our government, on the part of this foreigner, is beautiful and commendable and is a double incentive to loyalty and devotion on the part of our native-born population. It is the intelligence, honesty, industry and virtue of the cosmopolitan populations of the world that have contributed so much to the strength and happiness of our nation.

He loveth our nation. (Luke 7 : 5.)

OUR FIRST LABOR PARLIAMENT

THERE has recently been held in Washington, D. C., a conference of the labor leaders of the country, which was not only significant in its personnel, but is likely to be far-reaching in its results. The conference was held upon the call of Secretary of Commerce and Labor Straus, and there assembled to confer with the labor chieftains a number of government officials having to do with the interests of the workers of the country. One of the principal objects of the conference was the interchange of ideas as to the present and future policies of the Bureau of Labor and the Bureau of Immigration, branches of the Federal government which in their operation exert an important influence upon the status of the American workingman.

In the unique parliament that assembled in the offices of Secretary Straus almost all the national and international labor unions were represented by their national officers. The presence of such men as Samuel Gompers, John Mitchell, Warren S. Stone and Frank Morrison indicated the importance attached to the meeting by the leaders in the labor world. Nor was it only organized labor that had its spokesmen, for the unorganized and unemployed were also represented. The only woman participant, Mrs. Georgia Ferguson, came as the delegate from the convention of the unemployed recently held in St. Louis.

One of the principal topics discussed was the problem of the unemployed—a problem just now especially acute, owing to the fact that, according to statements submitted to the conference by Mr. Gompers, more than two million workers are out of employment in the United States at this time. Mr. Gompers read a summary of the reports made especially for the occasion by the various bodies of industrial workers affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and the showing was that in no trade is there less than fifteen per cent. of the workers out of employment, while in many of the principal lines of industry from forty to fifty per cent. of the toilers are now idle, and have been for months past. There was an animated discussion as to what the national government could do to relieve the situation in such a time of depression, either by giving employment to men on great public works or by assisting those out of employment to make their way to sections of the country where labor might be in demand.

By way of illustration, it was pointed out that the farmers of the Middle West are each year in dire need of farm help and harvest hands at the very time that operations are at the lowest ebb in many industrial centres. Secretary Straus proposed a search for some plan to provide the unemployed with transportation to the Western farms, where workers are needed, and to enable the toilers to return to their homes when the season of agricultural activity is over.

Another subject considered was a means to make effective the "Foundation for Industrial Peace"—the tribunal of arbitration which President Roosevelt founded a couple of years ago by his donation of the $40,000 Nobel peace prize, which was awarded to him for the prominent part he played in bringing about the end of the Russo-Japanese war.

Still another important topic discussed concerned the discovery of effective means to counteract the baneful influence of unscrupulous steamship agents and others who induce constantly increasing numbers of immigrants to come to this country from Europe, with wrong impressions as to labor conditions on this side of the Atlantic and a wholly erroneous idea of the wages that can be earned, even if satisfactory employment be found. In other words, Secretary Straus and the officials of his department asked the help of the labor leaders to stem the tide of immigration which comes to America with the idea that this country is an Eldorado, where high wages are paid for little work and where it is possible to save money rapidly.

The First Labor Parliament in Session in Washington, D. C.

The recent conference—the first gathering of the kind ever held—was entirely deliberative and informal in character. However, it is believed that it marks the launching of a movement that will result in intelligent and sympathetic co-operation between organized labor and the agencies of the government—a relationship such as is seen in Germany in the Advisory Council, in Austria in the Labor Council, and in France in the Supreme Council of Labor.

An Enjoyable Present

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I received to-day the gift of Art Pictures from you. I had no idea they would be so attractive. They are a beautiful, desirable and most enjoyable present. Please accept my thanks for them, and I also thank you for the beautiful words that accompanied them.

May the uplifting wish of yours, from Num. 6, which will be seed sown by you in many lives this winter, bring back to your own heart, and to your household, an abundant harvest, and, having seen the seed, we know what the harvest will be for you and for yours. MRS. ISABELLA BANKS.

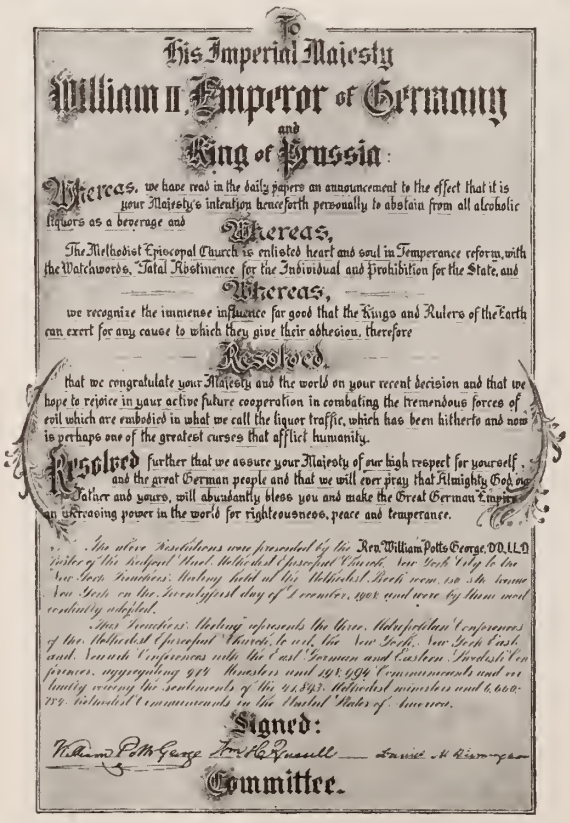
Washington, D. C.

AMERICAN METHODISTS TO EMPEROR WILLIAM

THE friends and advocates of temperance in the United States were most agreeably surprised and gratified by an announcement, in the daily papers of December 18 last, that His Imperial Majesty, the Emperor of Germany, had decided henceforth to abstain from the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and personally to use instead at State banquets and receptions a temperance beverage, specially prepared for that purpose. This is, as far as we are aware, the first time in modern history that any crowned monarch has announced such an intention.

At the regular weekly Methodist Preachers' Meeting, held in the Methodist Book Rooms, New York, on December 21, suitable resolutions congratulating the Emperor, and assuring him of their prayers for blessings on himself and his empire, were presented by Rev. William Potts George, D.D., LL.D., pastor of Bedford Street Church, New York, and cordially adopted by the meeting. This preachers' meeting represented 974 ministers and nearly 200,000 communicants, and in its temperance sentiments virtually voiced the opinion of 41,893 ministers and 6,660,784 Methodist communicants in the United States. The engrossed copy of these resolutions, measuring 17x22 inches, and executed by Professor S. E. Leslie, of the Eastman Business College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., has been duly forwarded to the Emperor, through the Hon. David Jayne Hill, United States Ambassador at Berlin, and we have much pleasure in presenting our readers with a photographic facsimile of the resolutions on this page.

The resolutions recite the gratification with which lovers of temperance in this country received the news of Emperor William's decision to abstain from all alcoholic liquors as a beverage. They express appreciation of the immense influence that such an act by one of the world's rulers must exert everywhere. They conclude with cordial congratulations to His Majesty on his recent decision and with an expression of high respect for the German ruler and people, upon whom they implore the Divine blessing and pray that that nation may become an increasing power for righteousness, peace and temperance.



To
His Imperial Majesty
William II, Emperor of Germany and
King of Prussia:

Whereas, we have read in the daily papers an announcement to the effect that it is your Majesty's intention henceforth personally to abstain from all alcoholic liquors as a beverage and

Whereas,

The Methodist Episcopal Church is enlisted heart and soul in Temperance reform, with the Watchwords, Total Abstinence for the Individual and Prohibition for the State, and

Whereas,

we recognize the immense influence for good that the Kings and Rulers of the Earth can exert for any cause to which they give their adhesion, therefore that we congratulate your Majesty and the world on your recent decision and that we hope to rejoice in your active future cooperation in combating the tremendous forces of evil which are embodied in what we call the liquor traffic, which has been hitherto and now is perhaps one of the greatest curses that afflict humanity.

Resolved further that we assure your Majesty of our high respect for yourself and the great German people and that we will ever pray that Almighty God our Father and yours, will abundantly bless you and make the Great German Empire an increasing power in the world for righteousness, peace and temperance.

The above Resolutions were presented by the Rev. William Potts George, D.D., LL.D., Pastor of the Bedford Street Methodist Episcopal Church, New York City, to the New York Preachers' Meeting, held at the Methodist Book Room, 150 5th Avenue, New York, on the Seventy-first day of December, 1908, and were by them most cordially adopted.

Also Resolutions, likewise, expressing the views of the Methodist Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, the New York, New York East, and Newark Conferences into the East German and Eastern Swedish Conferences, aggregating 974 Ministers and 191,994 Communicants and certainly voicing the Sentiments of the 41,893 Methodist ministers and 6,660,784 Methodist Communicants in the United States of America.

Reduced Facsimile of Resolutions Sent His Majesty

Among the Workers

—MISS GRACE HILDEBRAND, the "Gospel Nightingale," lately conducted a series of evangelistic song services in the Baptist Church at Towner's, N. Y., with marked spiritual results. Twenty-five joined the church. All the services were largely attended.

—REV. CHRISTIAN SCHMITT, missionary at Nain, Labrador, writes, acknowledging recent gifts from readers of this paper, and adds: "We thank God for your gifts and pray that the same Lord who so wonderfully provides in icebound and dreary Labrador, may bless the givers and abundantly reward them for all kindness shown to the poor and benighted Eskimos of Labrador. Your recent gift has greatly cheered us, and enabled us to look forward and face another arctic winter, knowing that God will provide."

—A CORRESPONDENT of the Indian Witness, Rev. Mr. Francis, writes: "Father John, of Russia, believed that, through those who realize (and in the degree in which they realize) their oneness with God, miracles of healing, both in soul and body, will be wrought. And every day bore its tale of 'miraculous' cures wrought by God, through this consecrated man. In my study at St. Petersburg, I have conversed about her 'cure' with Princess B——, who had been bedridden for many years, and counted by the medical faculty a hopeless case. One day, Father John, after long silent prayer, took her by the hand, and in a tone of quiet authority said, 'Barishnaya (maiden), in the name and power of Jesus, arise and walk.' The Barishnaya told me that suddenly she became conscious of a tide of new energy rising within her, in the strength of which she obeyed; and that she had never had even a momentary return of the malady which had kept her prostrate for years. This is one of the scores of miracles wrought by Father John, of which one hears and reads in any and every corner of the Russian empire."

WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA

THE WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA is regular stock, not old nor antiquated, but brought right down to date, including the Election of President-elect Taft, and even giving a brief account of the recent voyage of the United States Fleet around the world. It contains the very latest information on every subject that can engage the human mind. Three hundred eminent specialists have contributed to this great work, and each one of the 75,000 subjects handled has been carefully and scientifically considered, and treated as though the reputation of the entire work depended on that particular article.

The Best Work of Its Kind

The World-Wide Encyclopedia answers every question, however difficult or abstruse. A digest of all knowledge from the earliest times is contained within its 10,000 pages, and no person, however untutored, provided he can read, need lack for full information on any subject within the scope of human knowledge when once he is the possessor of this great work of universal interest.

The World-Wide Encyclopedia is a Universal Educator, treating of every subject, great or small, within the range of human knowledge. It is a great compendium of Geography, History, Science, Biography, Art and Literature, and is specifically designed to supply in readily accessible shape all the valuable information contained in the cyclopedic literature of the age.

Binding and Typography

The World-Wide Encyclopedia is very handsomely and durably bound in heavy silk-finished cloth, with genuine gold stamp. The type is unusually large and clear and clean.

These twelve massive octavo volumes, aggregating nearly 10,000 large pages, make an imposing array, attractive enough to ornament the costliest library in the world. No other encyclopedia can make a better exhibit on the book shelves, and the ownership of this great work, a complete library in itself, ranks its possessor among the intellectually progressive men of the day.

Work and Study

sharpen the wits and strengthen the muscles of body and mind to meet the opportunity when it comes. Luck is seldom a great factor in life. The towering genius who can disregard ordinary rules and carve out his own fortunes by mere force of personality is only one of hundreds of thousands; he may appear but once in a century.

The man who stops a runaway horse in the street, gaining credit and, perhaps, advancement, has to have something more than the opportunity. He has to have the quickness of eye and hand, the courage and strength that come only with training. The falling of an apple at his feet revealed to Sir Isaac Newton the great principle of gravitation, which revolutionized science. Apples had fallen at the feet of other men before Newton, but he had been preparing himself unconsciously for that moment by years of study of the laws of matter. When the moment came he was ready.

The scholar, the student, the professional man, the mechanic, the mother, the wife and the housekeeper, will all find it a storehouse of world-wide knowledge, A TREASURY OF FACTS, A MINE OF USEFUL INFORMATION.

Self-Made Men

Some of the most successful leaders in every profession and every industry have been what are called "self-made men," because they had no advantages of early training and no one to give them a start. Henry Wilson, who became vice-president of the United States, was a poor boy whose parents apprenticed him to a farmer when he was ten years old. He educated himself.

The young man who decides to purchase the World-Wide Encyclopedia need not fear that after years of study he must shun comparison with the college graduate. He who is the fortunate possessor of that great work, and utilizes it for careful and intelligent study, need fear no comparison with the product of expensive university training. He will have levied tribute on the brightest minds of the age and of all ages. The concentrated learning of the centuries will be placed at his disposal—the ripest thoughts of all philosophers, the tenets of all theologies, the principles of every science, the rules of every profession, and the practical details of every industry are his.

A Home University

It will not be amiss to emphasize here the great dual advantages of the study of the World-Wide Encyclopedia. First, the study can be prosecuted at the home, or even at the workshop, without the aid of expensive teachers or apparatus; second, the self-culture which the scholar acquires by studying for himself, digging out for himself the great truths of nature, of science, of production and of commerce, is the best culture of all. What a man learns in that way sticks to him. He does not forget it like lessons learned by rote at school.

Man is never too young nor too old to learn. Socrates learned to play musical instruments in his old age, and Cato was eighty when he studied the Greek language. Izaak Walton was ninety when he wrote his immortal work, The Complete Angler, and thousands of other men have done their best work late in life.

Choice of a Profession

If you have not made up your mind as to the vocation of life you wish to pursue, a study of some of the subjects mentioned under "GENERAL HOME STUDIES" will help to form your choice, or to correct a choice unwisely made.

In connection with those studies, a perusal of the lives of men who have won fame in different walks of life, who have made the world richer by their writings and discoveries, will be found of fascinating interest.

In the life of some chemist, architect, engineer, lawyer, poet, painter or physician the young student may find inspiration or encouragement.

Many of the hundreds of biographies contained in the World-Wide Encyclopedia are character studies of the strongest kind, which no young man can read without being deeply impressed by their very valuable lessons. To mention some biographies of great men that splendidly illustrate how and why they achieved greatness—often in the face of bitter reverses—by virtue or sheer force of character, we recommend the following:

Character Studies

Franklin	Ney	Ben Jonson
Wellington	Boulton	Sydney Smith
Faraday	Richelieu	Lord Palmerston
Garfield	Dr. John Brown	Abraham Lincoln
Newton	H. M. Stanley	Diogenes
Charles Knight	Fr. Xavier	Burke

FARMING is the keystone of civilization and manufacturing is the cornerstone. Without the artisan there would be no comforts in life, no luxuries, and not even what we have grown to look upon as necessities. Mankind would still be wearing skins of animals and sleeping in caves. The artisan, the man who works with his hands to fashion or help fashion the endless products of the inventive skill of the ages, occupies a position of importance and dignity. He is a producer in the literal sense of the word. He can take to his heart the words of Daniel Webster: "Labor is one of the great elements of society, the great substantial interest on which we all stand."

Sound Advice to Artisans

A good artisan, a skilled mechanic, has something to be proud of; and the more skill he has, the greater success he will achieve, the greater advancement. What the artisan should carefully avoid is the danger of plodding in a single groove, of becoming a mere machine. Study of the principles on which his work is based, and of the tools and forces with which he is operating and the materials he is using, will enable the mechanic to become more than a mere machine. Intelligent study and self-culture, joined to the practical knowledge which comes from his actual labor, will increase his earning capacity as well as his satisfaction in his work. Such study will enable him to develop into the foreman, the inventor, the contractor, the employer, the manufacturer.

The artisan will also find that a study of the lives of inventors and mechanicians will stimulate his ambition, and that his knowledge cannot be too wide or too minute to aid his ambition. Self-culture will be to him a stepping-stone to success.

In aiding the artisan, ambitious of self-culture, there is nothing to approach the World-Wide Encyclopedia, which will furnish him with information on every conceivable subject connected with his trade. The dyer, cooper, foundryman, printer, miner, carpenter, mason, can all find plentiful stores of knowledge in its magic pages. We give below partial lists of studies that have been arranged for workers in wood and metals, and subjects of special interest to the farmer.

Valuable Suggestions

The World-Wide Encyclopedia is an inexhaustible mine of wealth to the earnest student, into which he may delve at will for the bright nuggets of the gold of wisdom. It is an endless orchard in which he may wander, plucking from every variety of the tree of knowledge the ripe fruit nourished by the work and thought of all the sages of the world.

A continued course of reading in the World-Wide Encyclopedia will strengthen the student for the battle of life. From the hour when a boy can read his mother tongue, he has it absolutely in his power, without teachers or schools, to master all the learning of the world. He will realize to the full the truth of the saying that "Learning is wealth to the poor, an honor to the rich, an aid to the young, and a support and comfort to the aged."

The great advantage of the World-Wide Encyclopedia is the prodigality and thoroughness of its resources. The student of law or medicine, the embryo architect, artist, botanist, farmer, mechanic or merchant, can not only find here the principles that will fit him for the prosecution of his chosen line of endeavor, but can acquire the broad culture given by general knowledge that will sharpen his faculties and increase his strength in his special field.

Are you discouraged because you have not yet achieved success? Take courage and read in the World-Wide Encyclopedia the life of Robert Bruce, who, after years of failure to free Scotland from English rule, being hunted for his life, lay hiding in a cave, where he saw a spider trying to clamber up the bare wall. Six times the spider renewed the task, each time falling back to the ground, but the seventh time it succeeded. Bruce, who had in despair determined to flee from his country, made one more effort, and won.

Self-culture is not a meaningless phrase, but a living, breathing reality. It gives a zest to life, a joy to the daily round of labor, which nothing can give so well as the constant intercourse with the great minds of the past and the great thoughts and intellectual movements of the present.

By the above instalment plan you pay for this work at the rate of LESS THAN FOUR CENTS A DAY.

A Word to Farmers

All wealth comes originally from the soil. The farmer bears the weight of the world upon his shoulders. To be successful he must be something of a naturalist and something of a chemist; he must know what soils are suited to the production of different crops, and what fertilizers are best adapted to aid in the cultivation of each crop. When the farmer is intelligent and knows how to produce the best results without exhaustive labor, farm life is the healthiest and most invigorating in the world. Brains and ability are fully as necessary in farming as in any other pursuit, and the time has passed when farming can be successfully conducted without keen intelligence and a thorough scientific knowledge. The World-Wide Encyclopedia is rich in information which will enable a man to become a scientific and successful farmer.

Helena, Queen of Italy

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE attention of the whole civilized world, since the recent terrible earthquake in Italy, has been centred upon the splendid conduct of the King and Queen of that country. They were never half so royal as when they descended from the ease and luxury of the palace to minister to the needs of their stricken people. Their Majesties made no delay in hastening by special train to the scene of the disaster, and Queen Helena insisted on going with her husband to undertake in person the work of relief. Their arrival was a reinforcement equal to that of a battalion that reaches a wavering army in its hour of utmost peril. Words are inadequate to paint the devastation and misery that they found. The people were shelterless in the cold, and almost maddened from starvation. Thousands of little children were orphaned. Homeless, famished, fainting and desolate, they stood amid the wreck of what had lately been a thriving community, and faced the wretchedness of an unknown future. Hope had died within their breasts. The King and Queen did not stand aloof issuing orders, but themselves at once lent a hand, feeding the hungry, nursing the sick, undertaking the hardest tasks and aiding to rescue those who were caught amid the ruins. Queen Helena was an angel of mercy. It seemed as if she were everywhere at the call of want. No Sister of Charity ever worked more wisely or with greater tenderness. The peasants of Calabria are very loyal to their King and Queen, and their pictures have adorned many a humble cottage wall; but from henceforth Queen Helena will be to them a patron saint, second only in their love and reverence to the Madonna.

It is interesting to study the steps by which this queenly woman has developed into a character so fair and gracious. Born a princess of Montenegro, a little principality of the Balkans, she was one of six daughters and two sons who composed the family of her father Nicholas. As Montenegro is not rich, the children of Nicholas were trained in the Spartan virtues of fearlessness and economy. Helena from childhood was accustomed to the free outdoor life of a mountain girl, riding and hunting with her brothers, and climbing with them the steep hill paths as safely and swiftly as any village maiden might. She and her sisters were educated in St. Petersburg, under the direction and at the expense of the Czar Alexander III., the father of the present Czar. The Russian Emperor is a near kinsman of the royal house of Montenegro. Helena was married October 4, 1896, to Victor Emmanuel, Prince of Naples and heir apparent to the throne of Italy. After the assassination of King Humbert, in 1900, he was succeeded by Victor Emmanuel, and Helena took her place among the royal women of Europe. They form a distinguished group, but not one among them in beauty, talent and goodness has attained a higher eminence than Queen Helena. She is a devoted wife and mother. Her children—three girls and a boy—are the objects of her personal care, and have inherited her beauty and grace as well as the pride and determination of their royal father.

An article in the Review of Reviews has the following interesting passage, which we quote: "The heroism and compassionate sympathy exhibited by the young Queen have roused the enthusiasm of the whole country. A quite unprecendented incident took place at an extraordinary session of the Italian Parliament soon after the disaster, when Signor Marcora, the presiding officer, presented to the members an account of the measures of rescue and relief which the government had undertaken. He spoke under the stress of visible emotion, and concluded by saying: 'And here, in the name of the Italian people, I offer my thanks to Queen Helena, "the first lady of Italy," for her share in the work of rescue and relief.' The whole assembly rose to their feet and cheered wildly."

The names of the children of King Victor and Queen Helena are: Yolanda, eight years old; Mafalda, six; Crown Prince Umberto, four; and the baby, Giovanna, not yet two.

A Venerable Matron

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD takes peculiar pleasure in helping to celebrate the birthdays of its older subscribers, especially when they have well passed the landmark of four-score years. One of these beautiful and dignified matrons, Mrs. J. D. Eastland, celebrated her eighty-ninth anniversary at her home in Marblehead, Mass., on January 14. Many friends called with congratulations. This dear lady has been for seventy-two years a professing Christian, having united with the Baptist Church when she was seventeen years old. We are glad to know that the weekly visits of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD afford her constant satisfaction.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—A TRAVELING SUIT FOR AN AUTUMN BRIDE. The most satisfactory material for your traveling suit will be a light Panama cloth or a serge, either plain or twilled. Have a skirt of instep length and a jacket of the same material, with a silk shirtwaist matching your suit in color. Your hat should be of dark straw, simply trimmed and not too large.

—J. R. S. Red ants are certainly a great pest; I know, for I once suffered from such an invasion as you describe. The only remedy is eternal vigilance. Thoroughly cleanse every place that they haunt; protect food by setting the legs of tables and refrigerators in pans of water. Usually borax sprinkled plentifully on pantry shelves will banish red ants, and it is as well to try burning a sulphur candle with every aperture of window, key-hole, etc., closed, not once but several times. Perseverance will rid you of the tiny marauders.

Drawingroom Assemblies

BY the term assemblies we do not here mean those social functions peculiarly the prerogative of the smart set, functions brilliant and bewitching in the glitter of their jewels and the splendor of their toilets. There are drawingroom assemblies composed almost exclusively of women, and convened by invitation, for purposes of piety or charity, in beautiful homes. For example, a hundred invitations were recently issued to representative women in our national capital. Those who accepted met in the daytime, under a distinguished roof, and had the honor of being addressed on a theme of importance to the womanhood of the country by the President of the United States. A drawingroom assembly may be called together in the interest of a hospital, an orphanage, or a needed reform. It may be for the furtherance of the beneficence of the Young Women's Christian Association, an organization that is more and more touching with friendly hand the girlhood of the country in its every phase. Sometimes those matrons who see with clear vision that worldliness is fast creeping over us, and who, therefore, would lift a banner in defense of the Sabbath or make a protest against the wastefulness and dissipation of continual card-playing, meet by appointment to talk over what can be done. Pessimistic onlookers may smile cynically and declare that in all this talk there is too much froth and foam. Yet beneath the talk there is sober purpose, and out of it grows a public sentiment that tends to improved conditions. These meetings of well-educated and well-bred ladies form a feature of each winter, and they are to be reckoned among helpful signs of the times and aids to progress. "The wrong that needs resistance, and the right that needs assistance," are enthusiastically discussed at these dignified gatherings.

Presence of Mind

The morning newspaper chronicled one summer day lately an instance of presence of mind that ought not to be forgotten. A young man from the city was standing on the platform of a country railway station, waiting for his train. Down the street, pell mell, rendered almost frantic with terror, came a runaway horse attached to a wagon in which were a woman and a baby. "Throw the baby to me!" shouted the man, and the woman, whose presence of mind was equal to the test, straightway obeyed and sent her infant flying through the air to the stranger, who caught the bundle as if it had been a ball and laid it on the platform out of harm's way. Then, springing on a bicycle, he tore after the runaway, caught the horse, brought it to a standstill and saved the whole situation. Presence of mind like this is an admirable quality, and when united with strength and skill is an asset worth more than stocks and bonds in the domain of personal character and ultimate success. The man's name was John T. Hays, a name unknown to fame, but it deserves to be written on an honor roll of heroes. The hero does not stop to think of himself or to guard against possible danger; he is ready to risk his life, if need be; he simply sees a thing to do, and does it as well as he can on a swift and generous impulse. If we could but secure a list of the thousands of obscure heroes who enrich the world every day by their nobility, we should need the recording angel's book.

The Little Doctor

A New Serial Story Written for "The Christian Herald"

By AGNES LOWE ELLIS

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

George Hunter and Dudley Verner were college chums and are stopping at the country home of the former. George is introduced to Miss Danforth, daughter of Squire Danforth, who lives on the fine estate called "Paradise." A village character, Jack Green, takes them to see "Paradise." They there meet Miss Danforth, and Dudley is introduced. As they leave, the Squire drives by on the way home. His daughter is surprised at his sudden return. He says he is going abroad, and will take her and her aunt. They go to call on Mrs. Hunter and her niece, Miss Sanborn. The Squire discovers that Mrs. Hunter is an old friend. On his return he tells Aunt Phœbe a family secret, which greatly agitates her. Dudley Verner starts life as a doctor in a quiet neighborhood. The two friends save a little boy named Donald Fraser from being run over. Mrs. Fraser was George's aunt, who had run away to marry Captain Fraser. They lost track of her. George finds she has been badly treated and deserted. Mrs. Fraser discovers that her husband still lives and again disappears. Squire Danforth finds a friend in an insane asylum who has information which may lift, his daughter writes, a cloud from his life. George's mother proposes to go to Long Branch. Jack Green comes to George and informs him that Captain Fraser was looking for the Hunter family to find his wife. George has his mother and cousin prepare for an early start. Green drives Fraser to the Hunter home so slowly that he arrives too late. The Hunter party stops in New York. Captain Fraser finds them and demands to see Mrs. Hunter and his wife. He will not believe that the latter is not with them. George comes in and informs him he knows something about him which will put him in safe keeping for some time. The captain leaves. Mrs. Hunter is hurried to Long Branch. The young men out walking think they see Donald Fraser, but he disappears in the crowd. Verner tells George the story of his life; that he was adopted while Mr. Verner was traveling in Spain. George and Dudley rescue Donald from a kidnapper and George is hurt. Mrs. Fraser and Donald are brought to Mrs. Hunter. All return in the fall to Mrs. Hunter's home. Ellen improves in health. A letter is received from Marion saying they will return to New York and that they are going to Mexico, where her father is interested in a plantation. Dudley discovers Captain Fraser dying in a hospital. He is penitent, and Ellen is with him when he dies. Her condition becomes alarming. Squire Danforth and Marian return, and then go to Mexico. Donald goes to New York to try a cure for his lameness. Ellen tells her sister she does not expect to live. Donald improves much under Dudley's care. George and Dudley become his legal guardians. Mrs. Fraser dies shortly after. Marian sends a welcome letter from Yucatan. Dudley feels he must have seen the places mentioned.

CHAPTER XVII

THE treatment of Donald's case was an entire success. Week after week sped on, and although he could walk only a very little at first, every day he became able to go further without the use of a crutch. How his guardians rejoiced over him, can easily be imagined. Mrs. Hunter became anxious to have a visit from him. She could hardly wait to see the child walk and run about like other children.

The matter of his education was often discussed, though they all realized that hard study would be out of the question for him until he should become quite strong and well. It was decided that for at least a year he should go on in his present way, reading and picking up "general information," which, with his inquiring mind and ability to ask questions and get at the root of everything, was sure to give him a good foundation for genuine study.

George yielded to Dudley's wish to have the child make his home with him, and the kind, motherly woman in whose house he had taken rooms, was very tender and loving to the little orphan.

"Brother Dudley" was the child's ideal of all that was noble and good. "Surely," the young man thought, as he realized how rich his lonely heart was in possessing the affection of this little one, "the 'bread cast upon the waters' is returning in full measure."

On one of the uptown streets, in a handsome dwelling where were to be found all the luxury that wealth could procure, lived a family by the name of Jamieson, and there Dudley and Geoge Hunter were frequent visitors.

The husband and father in this home had been sick unto death. To all appearance the sands of his life were nearly run, when, at the request of the family physician, who knew that Dudley had made a special study of this particular disease, he had been called in. He had been successful in his treatment of the case, and the usual fee seemed to those whom he had benefited so paltry, that in their gratitude they showered every imaginable kindness upon him. A son of twenty-one, and a daughter of nineteen years, both of them bright and intelligent, were the only children in this household.

The story of little Donald touched both parents' and children's hearts; and ere long his friends were urged to bring him to a quiet dinner party at the Jamieson home, where his gentle manners, not less than his beautiful face, won the favor of all.

On the anniversary of their wedding day, Mr. and Mrs. Jamieson planned to entertain their friends, and George and Dudley were among the invited guests.

John and Nannie, the son and daughter of the house, were great favorites in society, and many of their friends were included in the invitation for that evening.

Among the guests was an aristocratic-looking individual named Major Strahan. He had only lately come to New York, but George and Dudley had met him several times in society.

For some undefined reason, Dudley had acquired a dislike for this man. There seemed to him to be something insincere and meretricious in his manner.

In speaking of him to George, he said, "I cannot account for my likes and dislikes. I have very little control over them. Sometimes I fight my feelings, but often, when I do this, I find that if I had obeyed my instincts, I should have been saved a great deal of trouble."

"Yes, Dudley, my observations warrant me in saying that your intuitions are generally correct. Your impulses, when you follow them out, generally bring good results."

During the course of the evening, Dudley said to George, "I wish that man would not stare at me so. Go where I will, he seems to follow me and fix those awful eyes of his on me. What can he mean?"

"I am sure I do not know, Dudley, but to say the least he is certainly very rude. I'll see if I can discover the cause of his behavior."

George had noticed that the major had eyed Dudley keenly, and he had felt uncomfortable about it. At last he made a pretext of some kind for entering into conversation with him, and presently Major Strahan said, with an assumed carelessness of manner, "Did I understand that the name of that young physician whom I met with you is Verner?"

"Yes, Dudley Verner," answered George.

"Is he a native of New York?"

"No, I believe he is a foreigner by birth, although he has spent most of his life in the United States."

"From what country does he come, may I ask? Excuse my seeming curiosity, but he reminds me strangely of an old friend."

"He was born in Spain. His father was a Spaniard, his mother an American of Scottish descent," George replied, looking fixedly at him.

With a gasp as if for breath, he muttered, "Can it be?" Then, aloud, "I am faint. The room is warm. Give me water."

He tried to rise and follow George, then sank back in his chair. A stir was created in the part of the room nearest the actors in this little scene; but George quickly dispersed the anxious crowd by saying, "Major Strahan is only faint from the heated room. Please leave him to me."

The sight of Dudley, who came forward to render assistance, seemed to agitate the man. His face became so ghastly that George hurriedly whispered, "Dudley, please keep out of his sight. Go and order a carriage, and if possible we will get him away. This is no place for such a scene."

Major Strahan seemed stunned and shocked to such a degree that he appeared almost demented. In answer to the query, "Where are you stopping?" he muttered some sentences in Spanish, which were unintelligible to all save Dudley, who had remained near enough to overhear his remarks. At length he roused himself enough to say, "I need no one; I can go alone."

"You will allow me to accompany you, will you not?" said George. "I will willingly see you home."

"Home!" he exclaimed. "I have no home here."

"I mean to your hotel, or wherever you are stopping."

"Yes, I will go, but I need no one with me," he reiterated.

"I could not think of allowing you, or any gentleman, to go home to your lodgings in a strange city alone," George whispered quietly to him, as they went down the steps together to the pavement. "In your condition, it would not be right. Of course, I would not wish to seem obtrusive, but I hope you will pardon my persistence."

"The señor is very kind," he replied; but he added, looking around in a frightened manner, "come alone."

Saying nothing, Dudley, who had overheard this conversation, quietly slipped out and, mounting beside the driver, whispered, "Keep quiet; I will ride here." George observed him but made no comment. He simply put the major inside and stepping in after him quickly, called out, "Drive on to the address given you." Then, turning to the ghastly-looking man at his side, very unlike the gay-looking individual of an hour before, he noticed that, in spite of the careful make-up which had given him, to the casual eye, a youthful appearance, he could not conceal the fact that he was long past the heyday of his youth.

As they reached the door of the hotel office, he bowed obsequiously, and with profuse thanks, bade George goodnight, expressing a wish to see him as soon as he should have recovered from the effects of the over-crowded room.

Returning together to the hospitable roof which they had so lately quitted, George and Dudley talked in a bewildered mood of this strange episode.

"Are we always to be met by mysteries?" George asked at last. "What next, Brother Dudley?"

As they advanced one theory after another, concerning the matter which had stirred Major Strahan so deeply and had led to such signs of alarm, Dudley inquired, "Do you think that seeing me had anything to do with his behavior?"

"Yes, I have not much doubt on that point, Dudley; but his manner was to me unaccountable. He had been inquiring your name and your birthplace. When I answered him, he all at once said, as if to himself, 'Can it be!' In answer to my inquiries as to whether he were ill, he replied that he was faint from the heated rooms and requested a glass of water. I noticed a strange pallor overspreading his face, as his eyes wandered in your direction, and I must confess the whole thing puzzles me. He must have mistaken you at first for some one else."

"He has the air of one who is hunted, pursued. That scared look could come from nothing but a guilty conscience. From the few sentences in Spanish which I overheard, as he muttered them to himself, I judge that he must have committed some crime. But what can I have to do with him? I never, to my knowledge, heard his name before. Can there be anything connected with my early life, or that of my parents, that could cause him such fear? How I wish now, George, that I had insisted upon learning more of my early life from my adopted parents! I should have done so, if I had foreseen anything unpleasant in the future, or anything that could make it necessary for me to know more than had been told to me. If I only had even a portrait of my father and mother! But I have nothing to tell me of their faces. After all, no matter how kind and loving one's friends may be, it is for our own flesh and blood that our hearts cry out. I wonder if in a future state we shall love and know them, even if we have not seen them here."

George was deeply touched and could not break the silence by a word.

"I never met this man until this winter," continued Dudley after a moment, "and until to-night he does not seem to have noticed me. But here we are at Mr. Jamieson's and we must do our best to disarm the guests of any suspicion."

Fortunately, the pleasures of the evening were engrossing the attention of the greater part of the company when they entered, and, making their way to their kind host, they gave him a sufficient reason for the sudden illness of his late guest, and for their own absence. Then they joined the gay crowd again and so skilfully parried all questions that some laughingly said, "He must have come from a very cold climate not to be able to bear the heat of these delightful rooms."

Long after they had returned to the quiet of Dudley's office, they conversed upon the strange experiences which they had had together, since first they had met as schoolmates.

As they parted, Dudley said, "I have found a very interesting patient among my poor people. I must see her again to-morrow."

CHAPTER XVIII

WHEN George arrived at his lodgings, he found a telegram from his mother, saying, "Can you come home for a few days with Dudley and Donald?"

After a moment's thought, he decided that he could comply with her wish, and sent off an answer, "I will start to-morrow."

He well understood that her longing to see them, especially the orphan child, must be very great or else she would not have sent such a message. He was up betimes in the morning and, hastening to his friend's abode, found them both at breakfast.

They looked surprised enough as he entered at such an early hour; and still more so when he quietly said, "Have another plate brought in; I have come to breakfast with you."

"We are very glad, indeed, to have you," said Dudley. "But tell me, to what are we indebted for this unexpected pleasure?"

When George had made known his errand, it was decided that he and Donald should start at once; but Dudley felt that he must delay a little, as he was very busy and had promised to call upon one of his patients who was old and poor, and who would count the hours longingly until he made his appearance.

She was a Spaniard, and could speak very little English, so that a brother physician, who knew how well Dudley could speak the Spanish language, had enlisted his sympathies in her case. It had needed nothing more than the knowledge that she was ill and poor to secure his kind and careful attendance.

It gave him great pleasure to use a part of Squire Danforth's generous donation in relieving her wants, and procuring the attendance of a nurse to whom the weekly wages were a godsend.

"I shall follow you to-morrow, George. Take good care of Donald, and give my love to mother. Tell her I shall count every hour until I am free to go to her and see my home again, and remember me kindly to Lily and Aunt Phœbe. Poor old auntie! She, at least, was my friend from the first. Do you remember the day we took shelter there from the storm, George?"

"Remember it? I shall never forget it. I bless old Jack Green for taking us to see those grounds. You didn't like him much at first, did you, Dudley?"

"No, I thought he was a most impertinent fellow, but I changed my mind ere long. I wonder how Betsy is, and if he is as lazy as ever."

"You will surely come to-morrow, will you not, brother Dudley?" called the child, as he bade them good-by.

"Yes, surely. I wish I could go with you to see mother's surprised look when you come in, walking so nicely; but I must be off to my poor people."

Dudley's work was a labor of love in most cases, for much of his practice was among those too poor to pay a physician. He often laughingly said to George that there were always plenty of doctors to attend to the wealthy patients, while his poor people, before his coming, could have added to the lament of him of old, who said, "No man cares for my soul," the words, "No man cares for my body."

E. H., Kansas. "I wish to acknowledge, through the columns of your paper, God's goodness to me in many ways, particularly in answering my prayer for the restoration to health of a very dear one."

A. W., Kansas. "It is a beautiful and comforting thought to know that we can go to our Father in prayer, feeling assured that if we ask, in faith believing, for that which is best for us that our prayer will be answered."

A. B. W., Florida. "I promised our heavenly Father that if he answered my prayer, in restoring me to health, I would publish it in THE HERALD. He has answered in a direct way many, many other prayers, all my life long, for which I am ever grateful."

A. O. T., Iowa. "About a year ago my business was in bad condition, and it made it very hard for me to meet my obligations as they should be met. I told the Lord that if he would help me out, and pay up all creditors, I would tell it to the world through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He answered my prayer in an abundant manner, and in every difficulty I was sustained by his grace and enabled to meet my obligations. I praise his name for the wonderful blessings he has bestowed."

"Tell It Over Again to Me"*

Quarterly Review by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

WE have seen Jerusalem in all of its strength and grandeur, having been restored by Herod the Great, after the depredations made by Pompey and Crassus to the amount of ten millions of dollars. King Herod renewed and enlarged the temple, fortified the city by building three great towers: Hippicus, Phasælas and Mariamne, the first of which is standing to-day. He also built the Bridge of Herod, now in ruins, of which Robinson's Arch is a part.

We have seen Samaria, thirty-six miles north of Jerusalem, one of the most beautiful situations in all Palestine. The city is in a basin, between hills, and upon the slope of the hill of Samaria, from the top of which we view the Mediterranean Sea, many miles away, and it appears like a sparkling blue sapphire gem. In every direction the hills about Samaria are vine-clad. We have seen Gaza, in the distance, from the desert road. We are interested because it was there that Samson performed many of his feats, and finally was killed when he pulled down the Temple of Dagon, not only killing himself, but three thousand other persons.

We have visited Lydda, a beautiful village on the Plain of Sharon, between Jerusalem and Joppa. The roses of Sharon are blooming everywhere, and almost countless sheep are pasturing there.

We have seen Joppa, the city by the sea, with stones jutting out into it like tusks, the city itself built upon a hill, sloping down to the sea; orange groves interspersed between the houses, wafting their fragrance so that it is enjoyed by those on passing ships. Very ancient is Joppa—one of the oldest cities in the world.

People We Have Met

Jesus himself upon the mountain, over against Bethany, and five hundred friends with him. It was Jesus' leave-taking of the world for his home in heaven. Later we meet one hundred and twenty persons in the upper room in Jerusalem, among them the apostles and the holy women, who were with Jesus at the cross and at the sepulchre. All were waiting for the coming of the Holy Spirit, who Jesus had promised should come.

We have met the lame man who, for forty years, had had his station at the gate of the temple. We joined the throng who followed him into Solomon's Porch after his healing. We stood beside the apostles Peter and John as the crowd gathered about them.

We have looked into the faces of the seventy-one supposed wise men, who formed the Sanhedrin, and among them the high priest, Caiaphas, and the former high priest, Annas. They appear as men of bitter prejudices, narrow views, and, for the most part, hard faces. We would not care to trust our case with them.

We have met Joseph Barnabas from Cyprus, whom we found to be open-hearted and open-handed. He was the first to sell his property, and lay it at the feet of the apostles.

We have become acquainted with Stephen, who as a deacon ministered so wisely and sweetly. And we have also listened to his wise words as a lay preacher. We have seen young Saul, who cared for the garments of the men who were doing the stoning.

We have met Philip in Samaria. His face looked like a prayer. He had left Jerusalem because the followers of Jesus were being persecuted there; we met him again on the desert road, going toward Gaza, and afterward at Ashdod and at Cæsarea. We have met one man who was a deceiver, but Philip proved his wickedness. We have met one black man, who greatly interested us, the treasurer of Candace of Ethiopia. He was black, but comely, as he rode in his chariot in royal state; his face illumined by his search for the truth as it is in Jesus, pondering the roll of Isaiah.

We have become acquainted with a man who was bedridden for eight years. How tractable he seemed, ready on the moment to obey a command in the name of the Lord! We have met the lovely gazelle-eyed Dorcas, and looked into the faces of the widows and orphans who claimed her for their friend.

Preachers We Have Heard

Wonderful linguists they were; for they could speak in the language of any one with whom they came face to face! So that every man heard the Gospel in his own tongue, and three thousand were converted in one day—and not on one day only, but continually the number of converts multiplied. God had touched their lips with the power of the Holy Spirit.

We heard Peter preaching in the temple, in Solomon's Porch. He had a disorderly audience that day, because they were filled with wonder and amazement at the healing of the lame man, and they were further excited by his leaping and walking and praising God. Another element of disorder was the disgruntled Pharisees, who were not willing to acknowledge any good thing in Jesus or his followers.

We heard a bold preacher, who dared to preach salvation through Jesus Christ to the members of the Sanhedrin, a band of men who had themselves condemned Jesus to death —that man was Peter, and he was all the more brave because he was their prisoner. And John boldly supported Peter, he being also a prisoner with Peter.

We heard Peter and John preaching at daybreak in the temple, after having been forbidden by the Sanhedrin to preach in the name of Jesus. And there was a crowd of people listening to them. But their preaching was cut short by arrest, and they were again brought before the Sanhedrin.

We heard another man preaching to the Sanhedrin; his name was Stephen, not an apostle, but a lay preacher, a deacon—one of the new converts. But he spoke with such power that they were cut to the heart, and they gnashed on him with their teeth.

We heard another deacon preach—Philip, in the city of Samaria. The whole cityful went out to hear him. And we saw great joy in that city, because the people believed on the Lord Jesus Christ through the preaching of Philip. One man alone was in bitterness, Simon Magus. We heard Philip reprove him for offering money with which he might buy the power of the Holy Spirit.

We afterward heard that same preacher preaching to an audience of one, and his pulpit was a seat in a chariot, with his audience at his side. The text was Isa. 53:7, 8. So convincing was the preacher that the man became a convert, was baptized and went on his way rejoicing.

Miracles We Have Seen

Shall we not call the ascension of our Lord a miracle? "He was taken up," contrary to the law of gravitation, which would have caused him to fall rather than to rise, but he went up until a cloud received him out of their sight. Dr. Philip Schaff has said: "A true miracle is above nature, but not against nature; it is a temporary suspension of the operation of the laws of nature, but not a violation of the laws themselves; it is a manifestation of a higher order, which the lower order obeys. We have an analogy in the power of our will over the body, as by raising our hand we suspend the operation of the law of gravity. God controls and directs and extends and contracts the forces of nature, which are his agents. God alone can work miracles, or enable men to perform them. If we believe in an almighty personal God, we shall have no difficulty in believing the possibility of miracles."

We saw the descent of the Holy Spirit, appearing like tongues of fire, upon the head of each one in the upper room at Jerusalem. The brilliance was like fire, but unlike fire it did not burn any one.

We saw the miracle of power conferred upon the apostles in the command of languages, which was given them for the preaching of the Gospel to men of all nations and for the healing of all kinds of disease.

We saw the miracle of three thousand persons being converted in one day. But there were some who hardened their hearts and charged the apostles with being drunken.

We witnessed the healing of the lame man at the gate of the temple, which proved to be like a great bell calling the people together to praise God. It emphasized the fact that God cares for the bodies as well as for the souls of men. Many lame men did Jesus heal, as well as those who were blind or were lepers. Nothing is too hard for God.

We saw the miraculous healing done by Philip, the deacon in Samaria, who had been among those in the upper room upon whom the Spirit descended. Later we saw in Samaria the power of the Spirit transferred, through the laying on of hands by Peter and John, upon the Samaritan converts, who were then able to perform miracles in the name of their Lord.

We saw Æneas at Lydda, in a moment brought from the despair of eight years' sickness into the rejoicing of health by the words of Peter, "Jesus Christ healeth thee." And in this connection was another miracle, for it is written, "All that dwelt in Lydda and in Sharon saw him, and they turned to the Lord."

We have stood by the bier of Dorcas, the friend and helper of the poor and sorrowing at Joppa. We saw Peter coming into Joppa from Lydda, whither he had been sent for because Dorcas was dead. We saw him enter the death chamber, and then the weeping friends emerged, and then shortly after we saw Peter coming out and Dorcas alive with him, and Peter presenting her to her friends, whose mourning was turned into rejoicing.

Prisons We Have Seen

We visited Peter and John "in ward," where they had been placed at the command of the high priest, in order to be ready for trial the next day on the charge of being disturbers of the peace by their preaching in the temple. It was not a public ward, but was connected with the Sanhedrin, contiguous to their hall of meeting.

We went to visit Peter and John in the public ward, but met on the way the angel bringing them out, while the prison guard slept, and then we knew that God was their deliverer. We went again a little later to the prison, and saw the dismay of the prison guards because their prisoners had escaped.

Court Scenes We Have Witnessed

In the court of the Sanhedrin, Peter and John being on trial after the healing of the lame man, the seventy-one members of the Sanhedrin sat in a semi-circle, with the high priest in the centre. Their prisoners stood, and the man who had been healed in the midst, under guard, and there were false witnesses at their side. But how strange—the prisoner, Peter, becomes himself the accuser of his would-be judges. Chrysostom comments on the Christian wisdom of Peter on this occasion: "How full of confidence he is, and yet how he utters not a word of insult, but speaks with all respect." It has also been said that "the only titles with which Peter addressed them implied that they should be leaders in every good work, and favor all that would help the people." We were present at a second trial of Peter and John before the Sanhedrin. If possible, there was more interest in this second trial than in the first, because it followed their miraculous release from prison. In this trial Peter made an appeal to heaven and declared, "We must obey God rather than men."

We are again in the court of the Sanhedrin, but only one prisoner is in the midst. It is Stephen, the deacon. He was charged with speaking blasphemous words against Moses and against God. And many false witnesses were there to press the charges, and the false-hearted Sanhedrists believed them, or at least accepted them, because it suited their purpose to do so. The courtroom then became a scene of direst confusion as the judges gnashed on their prisoner with their teeth. But sublime and immovable stood the prisoner, with his face like that of an angel. Confusion grew worse confounded when they rushed upon him with one accord, and cried out with a loud voice and hurried him out of the courtroom to be stoned to death.

Truths We Have Learned

First, that Jesus will come to earth some glad day. It may not be in your time, nor in my time, but it will be in his own time. "Of that day or hour knoweth no one" (Mark 13:32).

Second, prayer precedes Pentecost, the gift of the Spirit.

Third, the Holy Spirit is the grace added to the Christian to fit him for service.

Fourth, medical work must go hand in hand with the Gospel.

Fifth, Christian courage can combine with Christian courtesy.

Sixth, the sin and unprofitableness of lying.

Seventh, God is ever present with us.

Eighth, The grace of God in the heart will lead to prayer for enemies.

Ninth, Godliness in its people is a blessing to a city.

Tenth, the joy and profit to be found in Bible reading.

Eleventh, faith and faithfulness working together in us bring blessing.

Called Higher

Mrs. Almira M. Douglas died February 18, 1909, at the age of seventy-eight. She had been a life-long member of the Methodist Church of Mechanicsville, N. Y.

Mr. Elias Gonser, Ashley, Ind., passed to his reward a few months ago, aged seventy-six years. Mrs. Mary Kimmel, sister of E. Gonser, Ashley, Ind., long a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, died at her home January, 1909, aged seventy years.

Mrs. Mary E. Rogers, of East Orange, N. J., was suddenly called to the higher life on December 19, 1908. A loving mother and faithful Christian. Her sister, Mrs. John Noble, went home to God a few months previous. Both were constant readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Passed away, at his home in Middlefield, Mass., February 13, 1909, Deacon Barton B. Graves, lacking a few days of seventy-seven years. He had been a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for twenty years. The Bible and THE HERALD have been his constant companions.

James G. Roy was born in Marion County, Missouri, March 10, 1845, and died in Clarence, Mo., at the home of his son, November 20, 1908, aged 62 years, 8 months and 10 days. He was trusted and respected by everybody. A good citizen and a faithful and active member of the Christian Church.

Mrs. Christina S. Wonner died at the home of her daughter, at New Market, Ia., February 7, 1909, at the age of eighty years and one day. She was a faithful reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for more than twenty years, and looked anxiously for its arrival every Monday evening. During her last sickness she asked if THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had come.

We Do Not Bind You to Secrecy

Farm Journal of Philadelphia is the leading farm paper of the country. It is clean, boiled down, cream not skim-milk. It treats topics in season, is written by practical men and women who know when they have said enough and quit. Its poultry department is strong and ably conducted, and its garden, orchard, household, stock, dairy and other departments are invaluable equally to the expert and beginner. While not a religious paper in the accepted sense it is full of sunshine and hope, with a remarkable influence for good. No trashy or medical advertisements are inserted.

Questions and Answers

W. P. N., Chardon, O. At the World's Congress of Religions, in Chicago, it was stated by a noted religious authority that nearly or quite as many people suffered death for witchcraft in New England as by the Inquisition. Are there any data to estimate the number who suffered under both kinds of persecution?

The person who made that statement was entirely wrong. During the Salem witchcraft delusion, twenty-one people were executed. A few others had been executed before, but none after. The total number for all New England was less than thirty. It is impossible to give the complete record of those put to death by the Inquisition in all countries. But Llorente reckons that in Spain alone 32,000 persons were put to death by the Inquisition in the space of 236 years; 291,000 were imprisoned or tortured. The Inquisition was in France until 1598, and was established in Italy and Portugal. It was not abolished in Spain until 1820.

M. S. A., Woburn, Mass. Why does the Pope never leave the Vatican?

The present Pope is the first Pope to leave the Vatican since the Popes lost their temporal power in 1870. The present Pontiff went outside the walls to visit some of the injured from Messina. The Popes hold themselves voluntary prisoners in the Vatican as a protest against the presence of the King of Italy and Parliament in the city, as they claim that they are the real rulers of the city and object to the presence of any other power. The government allows the Pope to rule over the Vatican grounds, and he has a castle in the mountains some miles from Rome, but which he never visits. The Popes have always objected to the unification of Italy under the House of Savoy. Before, it was composed of a dozen different States, a prey to dissensions and invaders.

A. R. Lathrop, Worcester, Mass.: Certainly, checks for annuity will be mailed to any address in the postal system in the world. See fourth paragraph on page 18 of our pamphlet.

N. S., Middle Island, L. I. What are we to understand by the phrase, "Whom he will, he hardeneth," in Rom. 9:18?

It means that there are some whose stubborn adherence to sinful courses results at last in the Holy Spirit being withdrawn from them, and in their being abandoned to the hardening influences of sin.

Reader, New York City, Station D. Of what nation is Queen Helena of Italy? He, I suppose, is Italian. What a noble King and Queen!

Queen Helena is a daughter of Prince Nicholas of Montenegro, an independent principality just east of the Adriatic. An account of this heroic prince appeared in this paper a few months ago, at the time of the Servian crisis. Prince Nicholas and his family are examples to their people for their noble lives. Queen Helena's recent visit to stricken Messina is not the first time she has risked her life to aid the suffering. She went to Calabria while the shocks were still in progress two years ago, and on one of her errands of mercy the rocks broke away beneath her feet. The King belongs to the warlike Italian House of Savoy.

Mrs. M. S. Atherton, Toledo, O.: We omitted to give rates for women in our tables on pages 8, 11, 12 and 14 of the pamphlet, "Happy Old Age and How to Secure It," in order not to confuse matters. Tables and rates for your particular case will be furnished you if you desire; simply write us, stating your present age. As the average life of a woman is longer than that of a man, the rates charged for Annuities are somewhat higher for women. In our proposition women require about one-fifth as many more subscribers to earn an Annuity than men.

W. M., Tipton, Ia. Were any of the kings of Israel or Judea crowned?

Yes; there are frequent references in the Old Testament to both crowns and diadems, the latter sometimes being used for both. The high priest wore a plate of gold in front of the mitre. It was tied behind by a ribbon. See Ex. 29:6; 39:30, 31. The same word used to describe this in the original is used to describe the diadem which Saul wore in battle and which was brought to David (II. Sam. 1:10). It was used at the coronation of Joash (II. Kings 11:12). David took a crown of precious stones from King Ammon at Rabbah, and it was used as the state crown of Judah (see II. Sam. 12:30).

Mary J. Tildon, Ithaca, N. Y.: You have somewhat misunderstood matters. Look on page 9 of our pamphlet and you will see that you have to secure the necessary number of new subscribers to entitle you to an Annuity of $10 only once. Subscriptions that you secure after the first $10 Annuity is earned count toward securing a second. That is, the work for each Annuity is done only once; the pension is paid every year.

A Reader, Lakeville, N. S. 1. What became of John W. Booth, the assassin of Lincoln, after he left the theatre? 2. Was he ever captured?

1. John Wilkes Booth got away on horseback after his dastardly deed, and escaped from Washington. 2. Soldiers were sent in pursuit, and he was brought to bay in a barn, on April 26, 1865. He was armed, and refused to surrender; he was then shot.

G. J. Tompkins, Detroit, Mich.: Yes, we shall be glad to send our Old Age Pension literature to your friend. Let us have the names and addresses of any others to whom you wish to send our pamphlet, "Happy Old Age and How to Secure It."

Rev. Joseph Hamilton (author of Our Own and Other Worlds, The Spirit World, etc.) in a communication to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD refers to the rescue of the Republic's passengers by means of the wireless telegraph. Dr. Hamilton adds:

"No doubt the event will be taken as a tribute to the genius of invention. And it is; Marconi has acquired deserved and everlasting fame. Very likely the result now achieved surpasses even the inventor's wildest dreams. But the circumstance seems to me to have another and higher suggestion. Does it not give us a hint of a capacity of transferring thought in the spirit world, far superior to our method of mere speech? Writing is calculated to give us a hint of the same thing. So is telegraphy by wire. But much more vivid is the suggestion of thought transference without wire. If puny mortal man, dwelling on this earthly clod, can discover a way of dispatching his thoughts over raging seas, what immense powers may spirits not have of speaking through illimitable space? Yea, and what powers of a similar kind may not mortal man rise to, when this clog of flesh is laid aside, and the spirit body has free scope for action! I apprehend that the main difference will be that, whereas we use a clumsy instrument now, the future

Mr. Roosevelt's African Trip Outfit

WHEN he starts on his African hunting and exploring tour, Ex-President Roosevelt will go pretty thoroughly equipped. Much of his camping paraphernalia has already been provided. Our photograph shows the dining tent, the smaller cooking tent, and between the two Mr. Roosevelt's camp chair, which is intended to serve as both chair and bed. It is entirely enclosed in canvas, and perfectly protected from insect pests. Some of the light cooking utensils are shown in the photograph.

WOULDN'T GO BACK
To Old Days of Coffee Troubles.

Studious, sedentary habits are apt to cause indigestion, dyspepsia, nervous headaches, etc., but often it's the daily use of coffee that is at the bottom of the whole trouble, and it is surprising how quickly these troubles disappear when coffee is dropped and well-made Postum is the daily beverage.

A No. Dakota minister writes of the relief obtained when he changed from coffee to Postum. He says:

"I began using Postum about a year ago while stopping at the home of friends during the absence of my wife.

"It seemed almost providential, for during that time I got rid of coffee and its attendant ills. I used to have bilious attacks about every two weeks that completely used me up for a day or two at a time.

"I did not suspect coffee and was unable to account for these attacks. Since I began Postum I have had but one slight attack and the change to restored health is most acceptable.

"My wife declared on her return that nothing would induce her to give up coffee, but after a few careful preparations of Postum, according to directions on pkg., she thought it was superior to coffee in flavor, and now we would not change back to coffee.

"We feel we owe a debt of gratitude to Postum which has done so much for all of us—children and older ones."

life will discard instruments altogether. Truly, there are glorious possibilities only a little way ahead of us."

L. W. Peterson, Ottawa, Ont., Canada: The exact rates for ages specified in your inquiry of recent date, and the other information you desired, were mailed you several days ago. If you have not received our communication by this time, kindly advise us at once.

R. D., Patchogue, L. I. Several days ago New York City was struck by a gale, and the wind was reported to be blowing at the rate of seventy miles an hour. How are they able to measure this wind velocity?

The wind is measured by an instrument called an anemometer. The one most frequently used is Robinson's anemometer. It has four hemispherical cups, placed sideways, all facing in the same direction, and supported by four light arms, which join at a central shaft. The speed at which these arms revolve is communicated by the shaft to wheels in a box below, and is registered on a dial like the dial of a pair of scales.

E. L. R., Quebec, Canada. Please explain Matt. 24:23-27; also Matt. 23:13-15.

The first reference is to false Christs (not false prophets only), who should arise and claim to be the Son of God in person, returned to take possession of his kingdom. Jesus foresaw the pseudo-Messianic movement which would deceive many. He warns them against false reports of the Christ appearing at various places, and also against mysterious voices from the desert, and he reminds them that when the Son of man does come he will come suddenly and be visible, like lightning, from all points and to all men. The second reference is a charge that the Pharisees have taken away from the people the right knowledge of God's revealed Word, which gives eternal life, and have substituted for it their wretched traditions. The law could not open the door of the kingdom. He charges them with being mere moneymakers, mercenary and heartless, inflicting suffering on the helpless to enrich themselves. And he accuses them of hypocrisy in spending money and effort to make a vain show of converting some one (probably a pagan) to their own shallow way of thinking, thus making him worse than before, being both hypocrite and apostate.

H. E. R., Calvert, Kan. After Jonah preached to Nineveh, what became of him?

It is said by Epiphanius that he went to Tyre and lived there thereafter, and died and was buried in the tomb of Cenezæus, a judge of those days. A sepulchre called by his name is also shown at Mosul.

A. H. B., Grosse Pointe, Mich. In I. Chron. 2:13-16, we are told that Jesse was the father of David, and that his two sisters were Zeruiah and Abigail. In II. Sam. 17:25 we are informed that Abigail, sister to Zeruiah, was the daughter of Nahash. So it follows that Nahash was the mother of David as well as of his two sisters.

Nahash is a man's name and also the name of a city. The Jewish rabbins have a universal tradition that Jesse (the father of David) and Nahash were identical. Another explanation of the passage in question is that Nahash, King of the Ammonites, had a wife who afterward became wife to Jesse and the mother of his children; Abigail and Zeruiah, however, having been born while she was wife to Nahash. They would, therefore, be half-sisters to David, yet not daughters of Jesse. Nothing can be asserted positively on the matter. The last mentioned explanation is given by Dean Stanley in his History of the Jewish Church.

R. M. Ridenour, Billings, Okla. Are you aware that when the people of Oklahoma voted on our Constitution we voted on Statewide prohibition? And we won by a large majority. Now, the mails are flooded hy the whisky advertisements and literature. There is no home that does not receive it, begging for an order and promising to ship in packages that will hide the contents from being known. The railroads are our great "bootleggers." Our roads are strewn with bottles, and drunkenness continues. As long as our mails are open to whisky literature, and the railroads deliver prohibited whisky in our State, the boast of the whisky people that prohibition will not prohibit will be true.

This is a bad condition of affairs and should not be permitted to continue. If there is no law on the statute books of the State at present, meeting the case, steps should be taken to have one enacted. Thereafter, the citizens, through the proper State and county officials, could see to its enforcement.

Reader, Wheeling, W. Va. 1. Was King Saul a converted man? 2. Did the witch see Samuel when he was called up? 3. Was Judas Iscariot ever a converted man?

1. Saul was a man of strong passions, yet with many noble qualities, although not a spiritually-minded man, like David. Made king in obedience to public clamor, he had what Euripides calls "the worthy form of royalty"—a large frame, a commanding presence and a high courage. That he was in no sense a king "after God's own heart" (see I. Sam. 15:35) is shown by his repeated transgressions and his conduct toward David. 2. Already answered in a previous issue. 3. Judas was probably drawn by the teachings of John the Baptist or of Jesus, and his call as an apostle implies that he had previously declared himself a disciple. It is impossible to judge what baser or more selfish motives may have been hidden in his heart. He must have had some attractive qualities, however, and he presumably preached and taught like the others. It is possible, too, that the evil in his nature developed with the opportunities, as he traveled with the twelve and was the custodian of all moneys and offerings and the general almoner or disburser as well. Jesus knew the heart of Judas (John 6:70), and doubtless saw from the beginning that he was a deceiver and hypocrite and that his heart had never been changed.

A. C. Y., Northern, Ill. What is the duty of a family toward a member who, upon the slightest provocation, raves like an insane person, and between times professes Christianity, and prides himself on his Christian principles; but every few days, or weeks at most, will give a free exhibition of wrath, and then adds, "It is all right, if I ask your forgiveness," and attends church services?

Such a one must be temperamentally excitable, and is no doubt aware of his weakness and even ashamed of it. Rebuke will accomplish little in such a case. Some friend, who is sufficiently friendly with him, might talk quietly with him, and endeavor to convince him of the wickedness and injustice of such outbursts. If he can be made to see the sin of giving way to anger, and led to ask God's help in overcoming his temper, much good may be accomplished.

Miscellaneous

L. M. S., Great Salem, Wis. 1. There is no specific prohibition against tobacco, but its use is unquestionably health-destroying. 2. No trace of the poem in our collections.

B. F. Riord, West Eighty-fourth Street, New York: The information you requested has been forwarded you and we trust that you have received the same before this. May we ask that in the future you write only on one side of the sheet; and please remember, in writing about Annuities, not to mention any other business in the same letter. Stick to Annuity matters only, as the mail intended for this department is handled separately and kept quite apart from other correspondence.

You should have sent full name.

AT THE BOWERY MISSION

PAST the midnight drear and cold,
See them waiting, young and old;
Homeless, hopeless, wayworn men—
Let us cheer them once again.
When the body has been fed,
Then some loving word is said;
And each wanderer they invite
To the Mission Hall at night.
In their homelessness and woe,
Nowhere else have they to go,
And they gladly seek the Friend
Who will love them to the end.

Brothers are they, gone astray;
Yet, perhaps, some future day,
When they find their place again
In the ranks of workingmen,
They will reach a hand to save
From starvation's awful grave
Others who in sorest need
Find in them a friend indeed.

"Feed the hungry!" there they stand.
'Tis the Master's own command.
Dare we turn from them away,
Knowing in that coming day
We must meet the One who said,
"Feed the hungry! Give them bread!"
They have striven all in vain,
Let us help them in their pain.
We shall hear, if hearts are free,
"Lo, ye did it unto me!"

PUZZLE:

Find the Chaperon

One of these women is a married woman of nearly 40. The others are misses of 15 to 20 years younger.

Can you tell which is the oldest, the chaperon?

The chaperon looks nearly as young as her charges, and can mingle with the younger folks without a difference in ages being apparent—because she has retained her complexion and youthful lines.

Cosmetics did not do it—an occasional massage with Pompeian Massage Cream is what did it, and it will do as much for you. It drives away and keeps away wrinkles and "crow's-feet;" gives a clear, fresh, velvety skin; rounds out angles and drives away double-chins.

Pompeian Massage Cream

is not a "cold" or "grease" cream. The latter have their uses, yet they can never do the work of a massage cream like Pompeian. Grease Creams fill the pores. Pompeian Massage Cream cleanses them by taking out all foreign matter that causes blackheads, sallowness, shiny complexions, etc. Pompeian Massage Cream is the largest-selling face cream in the world, 10,000 jars being made and sold daily. 50 cents or $1.00 a jar, sent postpaid to any part of the world, on receipt of price if dealer hasn't it.

For men, Pompeian Massage Cream takes away soreness after shaving. By removing the soap from the pores it allays the irritation so distressing to those whom a thick, fast-growing beard makes constant shaving a necessity.

Answer to Puzzle: This puzzle has created so much discussion in families and among friends that an explanation is sent with every sample jar. (See offer below.) Have each of your family vote and discover who is right.

Facing Our Record *

MANY a man has had the experience of recalling, in some moment of awful peril, the whole of his past life. It flashes upon him like a great picture. No one who has ever seen, upon the sensitive plate of his own soul, a spectacle like this, can ever forget it.

There are beautiful poems extant, in which we are told of very wicked men who, by a single loving or kindly deed, redeemed a long life of sin and shame. God only knows the rights and wrongs of this matter. The workman who came at the end of the day received also his penny; but the safe and sound and consistent rule is that we shall be judged according to the trend of the whole life—the long mosaic of the years.

A book is great or not, according to the spirit which animated the man that wrote it. A life is great or not, on the same basis. The death-bed repentance, in the mercy of God, may save the sinner; but the Scripture teaches that it is by doing the works of faith, by our treatment of "the least of these my brethren"—of the naked, the sick, the hungry, the thirsty, the prisoner—that we are likely to be judged; and as in the terrible fraction of an instant we see our whole lives, so, when the Judge of all the earth sitteth upon his throne, it is the whole long record upon which the sentence is to be pronounced.

But it is not the deed only which the stern eye of the divine law beholds and considers. It was the prerogative of Christ to introduce a new feature into the world in this matter. For whatsoever idle words we speak we are to give account in the last day. And, more, a man did not have to break the commandment with his hands or his lips in order to violate it; if the thought of evil was in his heart, he had sinned as truly as though he had translated the thought into action, and was to prostrate himself before God for forgiveness, as a guilty soul.

But we are not to judge. Man sees not as God seeth. George Matheson, in an eloquent apostrophe to the Father, says: "When Thy book is opened, I shall learn a strange story, I shall read a new list of the great. No more shall kings appear in the van, no more shall warriors stand in the front. It will be the good mother in the nursery, the frugal father at the plow, the serving sister in the home, the heroic sufferer on the bed, the earnest teacher in the school."

They that are last shall be first, and the first shall be last, in that great day.

None but an All-Seeing One can ever unravel the good from the bad in the character of a man, and decide which preponderates. One of our poets has expressed it thus:

In men whom men account as ill,
I find so much of goodness still;
In men whom men account divine,
I find so much of sin and blot,
I hesitate to draw a line
Betwixt the two, where God has not.

It is not a popular subject in these days—that of the Day of Judgment, with its picture of every man before the bar, to answer for all the deeds done in the body; but we must never forget that, though God is Love, he is also incarnate justice. In different ages, different aspects of the Divine Being have impressed the people. The Puritans beheld him chiefly as the stern Judge. The thought gave fibre and force to their own characters. As one of their number said, small things could not discourage them. They were men of iron. We need more of that temper in this softer day. There are terrors in God's law, as well as beauties and delights in his love.

The Wicket Gate *

THE figure of the wicket-gate, so effectively used in Bunyan's great allegory, pictures the entering in to the Christian life as, indeed, strait and difficult, and yet possessing elements of beauty and romance.

The deep and subtle charm of the Christian life, with its strivings after the elusive perfection of its great Leader, is eloquently portrayed by Dr. Crothers, in one of his most original passages. It runs something like this: "Dull! the pursuit of the higher life, with its images of deathless beauty, its heroes with their thrilling records—its lofty examples, excelling all the other patterns set before us in history or fiction—this is the most romantic, the most absorbing and exciting thing in the world."

Bunyan found out this truth hundreds of years ago. It is what makes generation after generation read with breathless interest his typical story of the pilgrimage which every honest Christian must undertake. It is what gave to the old Middle-Age tales of chivalry almost their sole value—this wonderful and ever-enchanting spectacle of the human soul bent upon gaining the highest and best—encountering obstacle after obstacle—sometimes overcome, oftener conquering, at last receiving the crown.

And all have to pass through the little wicket gate.

This doorway differs for the different ages. The old Jews passed it when they kept their law to the letter; but keeping the letter of any law today does not pass us through the gate. Especially keeping the mere letter of the law of Christ does not. President William DeWitt Hyde says: "Jesus is as much more searching and severe than Moses as the heavens are high above the earth; as love is deeper than law. The Christian spirit requires more of us than any principle or law, Greek or Hebrew, that was ever promulgated. Christ translated law into love." And until we ourselves have also learned to love our brethren with a love to which the love of self is as nothing, we are not fit to be admitted into our Father's kingdom.

In ancient days, the idea prevailed among many races that the wicket gate to the favor of heaven was personal torture and humiliation. Men lay in sackcloth and ashes; they made painful pilgrimages; they lacerated themselves. This was the result of fear. They saw the awful manifestations of the Almighty's power, as we have lately seen it in earthquake and flood and fire, and they hoped to divert his wrath from themselves by their sufferings.

These are mysterious. It was no wonder that in a darker age men saw only the terrible side of Jehovah; but we behold so many and such greater marks of his love and goodness that our abject fear vanishes. We stand upright, as the sons of God. It is the only noble attitude to take—the attitude of love and trust. Love is our wicket gate.

Martin Luther saw this when he rose to his feet on the stairs of penance, and said, as the great light burst on him, "The just shall live by faith, not works." Dr. Jefferson reminds us that that is what Paul means when he says, "Ye have been called unto liberty;" but it was not the liberty of the flesh, it was the liberty of love—that love which bids a man "go to work and fill the days with gracious deeds." Get the heart full of Christ's love, and "Good Will" will pass you instantly through the narrow gate.

CONGENIAL WORK

And Strength to Perform It.

A person in good health is likely to have a genial disposition, ambition, and enjoy work.

On the other hand, if the digestive organs have been upset by wrong food, work becomes drudgery.

"Until recently," writes a Washington girl, "I was a railroad stenographer, which means full work every day.

"Like many other girls alone in a large city, I lived at a boarding house. For breakfast it was mush, greasy meat, soggy cakes, black coffee, etc.

"After a few months of this diet I used to feel sleepy and heavy in the mornings. My work seemed a terrible effort, and I thought the work was to blame—too arduous.

"At home I heard my father speak of a young fellow who went long distances in the cold on Grape-Nuts and cream and nothing more for breakfast.

"I concluded if it would tide him over a morning's heavy work, it might help me, so on my way home one night I bought a package and next morning I had Grape-Nuts and milk for breakfast.

"I stuck to Grape-Nuts, and in less than two weeks I noticed improvement. I can't just tell how well I felt, but I remember I used to walk the 12 blocks to business and knew how good it was simply to live.

"As to my work—well, did you ever feel the delight of having congenial work and the strength to perform it? That's how I felt. I truly believe there's life and vigor in every grain of Grape-Nuts."

The Gospel of the Kingdom

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE last command of our Lord Jesus had been given to his disciples, after his resurrection, as recorded in the Gospel of Matthew. They had been sent forth by him to preach what he himself had preached —the Gospel of the kingdom. He had already told them of a kingdom of God which "cometh not with observation," and which "is within you;" but which by no means answered to that which the prophets described, and which had been their anticipation in the coming of their Messiah. They had not fully understood, until the Holy Ghost came upon them, how Israel, through her rulers, had rejected the kingdom and the King, in the person of God the Son, as their fathers had rejected God the Father in the time of Samuel. The Lord never said to them that the spiritual kingdom was entirely to replace the kingdom of the prophecies, but that it was not for them to know the times and seasons, which the Father had set within his own authority (Acts 1:6, 7, R. V.).

He did not tell them how these rulers were about to have one more test in the person of the Holy Ghost before the offer of the kingdom to that generation would be withdrawn, and another economy introduced. "But," he added, "ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you and ye shall be my witnesses, both in Jerusalem and in all Judea, and Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth." The disciples, far from being downcast when their Master left them, "returned to Jerusalem with great joy." They could not but anticipate continuous victory, and the conversion of Israel, and all Judea, and then that nations should be brought to the feet of their Lord, and the prophecy should be fulfilled that all nations should be blest through Abraham's seed.

And when, on the day of Pentecost, the Holy Ghost came upon them, and they spoke with other tongues, and three thousand people were converted and transformed in spirit, life and character in one day, it seemed as though these messengers of the Gospel would carry all before them. Yet "the powers that be" were conspicuously absent among those that yielded, and the appeal of Peter found no response among earth's great ones.

The miracle wrought in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth upon the man born lame gave Peter another opportunity to bear witness to the Saviour, and again he appealed to the people to see from Scripture that the Messiah must suffer. The rulers of Israel did not repent. The apostles were threatened, but their spirit was manifested to be the Spirit of Christ. Then came the judgment upon Ananias and Sapphira, and the imprisonment and release of the disciples.

When deacons were appointed to help in the increasing work of the apostles, Stephen, who was one of these deacons, a man "full of faith and of the Holy Ghost," "full of grace and of power," provoked the anger of the authorities by his testimony for the Lord. They apprehended him, and brought him before the council, and he, full of the Holy Ghost, brought them also before the Council of the Holy Trinity, as he uncovered before them the sins of Israel as a nation.

The word cut them to the heart. It was their last chance, but instead of yielding to the convicting power of God these senators forgot themselves, and rushed like wild beasts upon Stephen and stoned him with their own hands. They filled up the measure of their iniquity, and they brought this man's blood upon them, and they brought upon their people the judgment which is still upon them, that they should be "scattered among all peoples."

A Good Living From Poultry on a City Lot

$1,000.00 In Seven Months From a City Lot Only Forty Feet Square

On this Lot about 60 Breeding Hens are kept and an average of 250 chickens

BABY CHICKENS, EGGS FOR SETTING AND CHICKENS OF ALL AGES ARE SHIPPED WEEKLY. AT THE PRESENT RATE OF SALES THE NET INCOME WILL EXCEED $1,500.00 BEFORE THE END OF THE YEAR. THESE WONDERFUL RETURNS ARE MADE POSSIBLE BY THE USE OF THE

PHILO SYSTEM

WHICH IS ESPECIALLY VALUABLE TO THE FARMER AS WELL AS THE CITY OR VILLAGE FANCIER, AND IS ADAPTED TO ALL CLIMATES, ALL BREEDS AND ALL PEOPLE

THE PHILO SYSTEM IS UNLIKE ALL OTHER WAYS OF KEEPING POULTRY

And in many respects is just the reverse, accomplishing things in poultry work that have always been considered impossible and getting unheard of results that are hard to believe without seeing. However, the facts remain the same and we can prove to you during the next three months every word of the above statement.

THE NEW SYSTEM COVERS ALL BRANCHES OF THE WORK NECESSARY FOR SUCCESS

From selecting the breeders to marketing the product. It tells how to get eggs that will hatch, how to hatch nearly every egg and how to raise nearly all the chicks hatched. It gives complete plans in detail how to make everything necessary to run the business and at less than half the cost required to handle the poultry business in any other manner. There is nothing complicated about the work and any man, woman or child that can handle a saw and hammer can do the work.

TWO-POUND BROILERS IN EIGHT WEEKS

Are raised in a space of less than a square foot to the broiler without any loss and the broilers are of the very best quality, bringing, here, three cents per pound above the highest market price.

OUR SIX-MONTHS-OLD PULLETS ARE LAYING AT THE RATE OF 24 EGGS EACH PER MONTH

In a space of two square feet for each bird. No green cut bone or meat of any description is fed, and the food is inexpensive as compared with food others are using.

Our new book, THE PHILO-SYSTEM OF PROGRESSIVE POULTRY KEEPING, gives full particulars regarding these wonderful discoveries, with simple, easy-to-understand directions that are right to the point, and fifteen pages of illustrations showing all branches of the work from start to finish.

It also tells how to make a brooder for twenty-five cents that will automatically keep all lice off the chickens or kill any that may be on them when in the brooders.

"A TRICK OF THE TRADE"

Fully one-third of all the chickens ready to hatch die in the shell. After thirty years of study and practice we have discovered a simple way to save every chick that is fully developed and ready to hatch whether the egg is pipped or not. This, we believe, is one of the lost arts of the ancient Egyptians. It takes but a minute to save a chick and no skill is required.

OUR NEW BROODER SAVES TWO CENTS ON EACH CHICKEN

No lamp is required. No danger of chilling, overheating or burning up the chickens as with brooders using lamps or any kind of fire. They also keep all lice off the chickens automatically, or kill any that may be on them when placed in the brooder. Our book gives full plans and the right to make and use them. One can easily be made in an hour at a cost of from 25 to 50 cents.

Valley Falls, N. Y., Sept. 5, 1907.

It was my privilege to spend a week in Elmira during August, during which time I saw the practical working of the Philo System of Keeping Poultry, and was surprised at the results accomplished in a small corner of a city yard. "Seeing is believing," they say, and if I had not seen, it would have been hard to believe that such results could have followed so small an outlay of space, time and money. (Rev.) W. W. Cox.

Oct. 22, 1908.

P. S.—A years observation, and some experience of my own, confirm me in what I wrote Sept. 5, 1907. The System has been tried so long and by so many, that there can be no doubt as to its worth and adaptability. It is especially valuable to parties having but a small place for chickens; seven feet square is plenty for a flock of seven. (Rev.) W. W. Cox.

Ransomville, N. Y., Dec. 5, 1908.

Dear Sir:—Last spring we purchased your book entitled the "Philo System" and used your heatless brooders last spring and summer. The same has been a great help to us in raising the chix in the health and mortality. The chix being stronger and healthier than those raised in the brooders with supplied heat. We believe this brooder is the best thing out yet for raising chix successfully. We put 25,000 chix through your heatless brooders this last season and expect to use it more completely this coming season. We have had some of the most noted poultrymen from all over the U. S. here, also a large amount of visitors who come daily to our plant and without any exception they pronounce our stock the finest and healthiest they have seen anywhere this year.

Fairy Soap

Dyed soaps hurt! Soap coloring hides poor material, and adulterations, which clog your pores and raise havoc with your skin.

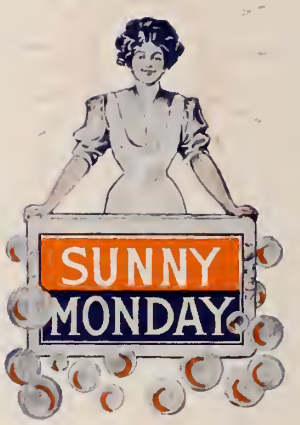
Fairy Soap is white and pure—it stays white; contains only edible products. There is no bite, no color, no high perfume, no adulteration, no sham in Fairy Soap.

It is just the finest piece of toilet and bath soap possible to make.

With all these virtues, Fairy Soap (the floating, oval cake) sells for 5c.

Fairy Soap was granted highest possible awards at both St. Louis and Portland Expositions.

"Have You a Little 'Fairy' in Your Home?"



Sunny Monday

is white and pure because it is made from choice tallow and cocoanut oil, while many laundry soaps are made from rosin and refuse greases. With which would you prefer to have your clothes washed?

Sunny Monday Soap *(N. R.) is quick to act—starting dirt the moment it touches the water; it saves rubbing, wear and tear on clothes, and untold labor and expense. Moreover, it will insure whiter, sweeter clothes, and make your fabrics last twice as long.

Sunny Monday Soap *(N. R.) lathers freely in hard or soft, hot, cold, or alkali water; will wash woolens without shrinking, and colored goods without fading.

Receiving Wireless Messages

Boys Transmitting Messages and Studying the Naval Code

Getting the "C Q D" Danger Signal

OUR NAVY'S WIRELESS SCHOOL

WHAT was considered the dream of a visionary inventor a few years ago—wireless telegraphy—is now an accepted fact, and the most skeptical admit its practical use when the War and Navy departments assign officers to develop the new invention and begin to drill recruits as operators.

Our government has decided to make the most extensive use of wireless of all the nations of the world, and the Navy Department has just asked bids for the erection of a high-powered station in Washington. This will keep the Navy officers in touch with ships 3,000 miles out at sea, both night and day. The recent triumph of wireless in summoning quick aid to the Republic, thus saving thousands of lives, has forcibly demonstrated the great value of this method of communication. The practical training of young sailor electricians for this new and important branch of the service has been progressing rapidly since the day Marconi startled the world by sending his message across both sea and land without the aid of pole and wire.

The Wireless School is quartered in the second story of the Bureau of Equipment Building in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and the students live on board the receiving ship Hancock. Lieutenant Commander Williams, U. S. N., is executive officer of the Electrical and Wireless School, and Chief Electrician Rice is the principal instructor. The class now being drilled in this new branch of naval work have come up from the electrical class located below, where for three months they have been put through a course of study on electricity in general. The general course is especially applicable to ship and station requirements, where they are destined to be sent for future duty. Actual work is given in the handling of electrical machinery, dynamos, and the manipulating of the electrical switchboard, which regulates the interior communication of a modern battleship. After twelve weeks of preliminary work in the lower school, they receive their final training by going through a month's practical instruction in the wireless class. After completing four months of thorough and systematic instruction, having obtained in this interval a fair knowledge of adjusting and manipulating the apparatus, they are prepared to graduate. An interesting and picturesque sight is afforded by a peep into this novel wireless schoolroom. Passing down the long corridor of the equipment building, and entering the spacious classroom, the visitor is plunged into a veritable beehive; all is bustle and sound. Seated around long tables are some one hundred bright-appearing young sailors, each deeply absorbed in mastering the wireless apparatus. For a limited time, a squad is drilled daily at the sending key; the remainder, at tables with pen and paper, are engaged in receiving and translating the sound messages sent from the transmitting room. The Wireless Navy code alphabet is made up of a series of dots and dashes of relative length. These are indicated by buzzes received in the ear 'phone, which must be accurately learned by the beginner. They are also printed by the automatic Morse recorder on a tape line. Receiving by ear is, however, the most speedy, and the method generally employed in active service by operators on ships and shore stations. On weekly examination days, the instructor tests the ability of each individual of the class. Ten to twelve words per minute is the average sending capacity. Experienced operators, under favorable circumstances, send from twelve to fifteen words, and receive as many as thirty.

Chief Electrician Rice imparts the benefit of his expert experience in the taking apart and putting together of all the main electrical instruments. This is the most vital part of the training of wireless operators. Most of them are destined to be sent to remote localities, where they must depend entirely upon their own technical skill to repair any break in their apparatus. A novel sight is a section of the class, high aloft on one of the fighting masts of one of the battleships now at the Navy Yard, examining the method of arranging the aerial wires.

During the thirty-day term, with daily practice of six hours and thorough scientific and systematic drilling, the wireless aspirants have been so perfected in the art that they are competent to enter any ship or shore station of the Navy. They are able to flash a message from 100 to 1,000 miles' distance, and to receive and translate the most complicated communication.

In order to get a fine body of operators, the government offers liberal pay inducements, including rations, far in excess of the remuneration given to ordinary seamen. The latter receive only $20 per month; while the young man who enlists and passes the preliminary examination in electricity, is rated as third-class electrician, at $30 per month. Advancement is certain, if accompanied by conscientious and ambitious labor, up to second-class, bringing $40, and thence to first-class, at $50 per month. The highest rating of chief electrician amounts to $75. The efficiency of the government wireless telegraph is strikingly illustrated by the fact that a message was received recently at the Point Loma Station, in California, from the flagship Connecticut, 2,900 miles away, en route to New Zealand.

WALKING WITH JESUS

IT was in the late afternoon. Two men (the unknown of the two probably Luke himself) are journeying with painful steps and slow toward the little village of Emmaus. They are in deep converse; their faces are sad; they are arguing; they are quoting Scripture; they are recounting the incidents of the darkest tragedy in human history—the judicial murder, at the hands of a mob, of the most perfect man the world has ever seen. They are recalling his various teachings, and now their hearts are broken because they feel that they have completely misunderstood the man, misunderstood his message, misunderstood the Old Testament, and they stand before the world discredited; in fact, the world could rightfully call them fools.

As they speak about Jesus, unknown and unnoticed by them, there comes out of the evening air the figure of a man. He keeps step silently with them. They are still unconscious of his presence. He is listening to what they say; and, as they continue in their sorrowful discussion, a wonderful look of pity and sympathy sweeps across the beautiful face of the stranger. By and by they become conscious that a man has joined them, and they begin to speak with him. He asks them a few tender, helpful questions. They make reply that they have been talking about the strange happenings at Jerusalem in the last three days. He does not seem to understand, and they explain that they mean Jesus and what has happened to him. And then he says in stern accents: "Oh, dark-minded men!" (He did not use the word "fool," as we use it in our modern speech.) "Oh, men that cannot perceive the truth! Oh, slow of heart, men dull on the spiritual side; do you not understand the plain teachings of the ancient Scriptures?" And beginning with that opening chapter in Genesis, where the seed of the woman is proclaimed as the avenging power that shall some day bruise the serpent's head, and passing down through all the marvelous imagery and ritualism of the story of the chosen people, probably quoting those magnificent Messianic Psalms, where the Lord said, "Sit thou upon my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool," pointing to that passage in Isaiah which described the suffering Servant of the Most High; coming down to Malachi, where the messenger so suddenly appears in the temple, proclaiming that the Lord shall come swiftly, he unveils to these troubled minds the real meaning of all that God has said.

Discerning Christ

They do not understand. They come at last to the little home; they ask the interesting stranger to enter; he makes as if he would go on; they constrain him to come in. He takes his place with them at the evening meal, and then "takes bread and breaks it, and gives thanks"; and instantly, through that common act, there comes sweeping into the consciousness of these two men the fact that this is Christ; and he vanishes out of their sight. Then they remember that their hearts did burn within them while he talked with them by the way. They arise, leaving the meal unfinished, and hasten back the long miles to the city to proclaim to the astonished and delighted apostles that they, too, have seen the Lord.

Now this very sweet and beautiful story has a modern meaning and application for us; and I would like, first of all, to point out how that it teaches us what spiritual illumination means.

These disciples became conscious, when Jesus spoke to them, of an abnormal condition of mind, of the abysmal darkness in which they were living, in the midst of which truth appeared as falsity, and fact evaporated into fiction. "Oh, darkened of intellect and stupid and unbelieving of heart! You have all the facts, but you have made them appear as something else. Your minds are warped, dwarfed and dwindled under the subtle influence of some dire, deep-seated disease. You are not natural; you cannot think on a high plane; you cannot feel any response to a great, exalted appeal; you are not normal; you are wrapped in darkness, when God, who is light, has created you each to be as lights in the great darkness of the physical universe."

So, when the Lord draws near to a man and breathes upon his darkened life, the first result is that that man awakens to the consciousness that he is abnormal in his natural condition; that he cannot think the high thoughts of God for him; that all that is holy in the sanctuary of his spirit, designed for the indwelling of the Divine, has become broken and unclean, and must be repaired before God can enter in.

The next experience that a man has when Jesus joins him in his walk through life is a certain wonderful new understanding of the Bible. We have had in our modern days a battle over the Bible, the most severe that the Bible will ever have to face. When the modern scientific mind began to adventure forth into the wider field of human activity, it was inevitable that the standards and methods by which scientific men reached the impregnable fortress of their results should be applied to the Word of God and to the institutions which are based upon its teachings; and when that new method, with its relentless logic, with its absolute faith in facts, with its indifference to sentiment, began to burrow its way into and through the Word of God, we had a brand-new method of interpretation. We call it the method of historical criticism. A scientific man takes the Bible just the same as he takes a leaf from the tree, a fish from the water, an insect from the ground. He places it under the microscope. He asks first: What is this thing in itself? He asks second: What is the history that has made this to be the thing it is? He asks third: What are the relationships which characterize the larger life in this object? And then, he asks: What, if this development continues along the line it has followed to the present time, is to be the result when the goal is reached?

The Priceless Heritage

I am so glad that the Word of God has been subjected to that experience! The only thing in this universe that is true is truth; and if we have been believing a lie, how thankful and grateful we ought to be to the man who sets us free from that delusion! And if we have been believing a truth which is able to demonstrate its truthfulness in the light of the highest progress of the human spirit, how glorious it is for us to know the fact!

So we hail with joy the stressful, painful time in which we live, and we are glad that the foundations of our Christian faith are being subjected to the penetrating investigation of the modern mind.

But when a man has Jesus join him in the way, he becomes acquainted with the Bible in a manner quite different from, and exalted above, the highest method that the world has ever known. I believe that the way to begin the study of the Bible to-day is to begin with Jesus Christ. We do not need to go back to the Bible now and read it in order to hear about Christ for the first time. He has lived in this world for nineteen centuries. We have seen him enshrined in our Christian mother and our Christian father. A man said to me the other day: "What is your most priceless heritage?" And I answered: "The one thing that my father left for me at his death, that I prize and consider above value, is the memory of his prayers." When the summer morning broke over the eastern hills and all the air was fragrant with the odor of the new-mown hay from the meadow, and the song of the birds mingled with the flood of awakening life in the neighborhood, the memory of a good man who knelt in the midst of his family—lifting his business, his loved ones, his neighbors and his nation into the presence of God upon the wings of a beautiful prayer—that is the most priceless heritage that you can leave your children.

The New Vision

You may find Jesus to-day when you begin to live in your Christian home; and finding him thus incarnate in the life of your Christian brother or sister or friend, you accept him as your Saviour in your heart, and Lord of your life; and then, walking with him, go back to the Bible and trace the tree downward into its rootage in that ancient soil, and you will discover that the Word of God has a meaning which can never be shaken and never misunderstood. It is the Word of God incarnate in the man Christ Jesus. These two disciples, on their way to Emmaus, understood the Old Testament for the first time. They had an illumination upon the doctrines of that old Bible that had been so dear to their fathers and to them. They had never understood the thing that they had read until Jesus walked with them, his hands bearing fresh scars of the nails, and his body radiant with the resurrection life and glory.

One of the great experiences that comes to a man when Jesus joins him and walks with him is a new vision of the resurrection from the dead. I looked over this congregation this morning before I prayed, to see the different faces, and to find out the people that were here with empty vessels to be filled at the fountains of God; and I saw some whose hearts had been shadowed by repeated sorrows, that had broken their lives in two; and I saw some who were just beginning the new way; some women who, like that beautiful character in the Bible, had broken the alabaster box of precious ointment for the anointing of their Lord. I saw little children, whose young faces were radiant with the joy of their implicit confidence in the truthfulness of their Master. I saw men whose faces were seamed with care, because of the terrific battle in the midst of which you spend your days. I saw men before me who needed comfort and encouragement and serenity to come into their lives, if they were to face their days. And I wished I could gather you up in my arms and carry you into the presence of the Lord. And as I looked over this congregation, with that thought in my mind, I wondered what I could say if I had come here this morning simply prepared to give you a lecture upon Christian evidences, or to give you a lecture upon some dogmatic point in systematic theology; or simply to unfold before you the thought and development of some beautiful work of literature; or to discuss with you the enlargement and upbuilding that comes to a man who is acquainted with art. How inadequate would be my message to meet the hunger of your deeper nature! But when I come with the message that Jesus suffered too; that Jesus was tempted too; that your death has a counterpart in his; that you, who have lately looked into the open grave, and have gone back to your home shadowed and silenced forever, that you have in Christ a Friend who also was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, and tasted death for every man; when I come to you and tell you this morning that Jesus was dead, but is alive again, and that he that liveth in him shall never die, how glorious, how fundamental, and how eternally inspiring and upbuilding is a thought like that!

Consolation for the Depressed

So, when these two men saw Christ alive, the heavens became illuminated, although it was evening. The noise and clamor of the mob in Jerusalem dwindled to a sigh, and they beheld before their awakened spiritual intelligence the vision of that All-Conquering One, whose garments are stained red with the blood of his suffering, going forth with his pierced hands outstretched in benediction upon the world; going forth to lay hold upon empires and to shake them into dust; to lay hold upon systems of thought and turn them upside down; to lay hold upon the imaginations and doctrines and reasonings of the greatest spirits of the ages; and by and by to transfigure the world into the kingdom of God. What a vision! A dead Christ would be dead to-day; but a risen Christ is alive now, and is alive forever more. Spiritual illumination is not complete until it penetrates to the dark depths, not of your grave and of mine, but of the grave of the Man; and when it finds nothing there but radiant angels to tell us that the Lord is risen, then your illumination is complete.

Now, there are a few very practical words that I would like to bring to your hearts this morning, as I close, and the first one is, that we ought to pay attention to that abnormal condition of mind which leads us to distort fact into fiction, to change light into darkness; and, though we are in possession of the truth, to remain powerless because we do not understand it.

The trouble is, that we reason in too narrow and shallow a way. That is, we reason without, and apart from, Jesus Christ. I come to you to-morrow as you stand in the midst of the wreckage of your life, and you, with pained face and the tears streaming from your eyes, and your voice trembling, reach

A REFUGE FOR THE HOMELESS

Lodgers Applying for Rooms

New York's Municipal Lodging House

Disinfecting the Clothing

DOWN near the lower end of East Twenty-fifth Street, in New York, not far from the East River, there has risen an imposing structure of iron, stone and concrete that has, at a little distance, the appearance of a huge hotel. Hotel it is, but of a far different kind from those which stand nearer Broadway and harbor beneath their roofs for a single night enough wealth to build a good-sized town. In this hotel the weary guests pay nothing for their simple supper and bed, for over the door appear the words, "Municipal Lodging House." It is the most modern and best equipped building for the temporary shelter of homeless men and women that can be found in any American city.

At six o'clock the doors swing back to admit the first of the men who have clustered outside. As they pass in, clerks ask their names, how long they have been out of work, and the name and address of their last employer. They then pass into the dining-room, where they are given a supper of bread and coffee. No limit is set to the amount each may have, and all may eat until their ravenous appetites are appeased. The amount of bread some of these hollow-eyed, gaunt and weary men are able to stow away is simply marvelous. It may have been days since they had their last meal, and in their heads and hearts lurks the fear that it may be a long while before they get another one. A physician examines the men, and any that are ill are sent to the hospital. A man is assigned to one of the dormitories, and compelled to take a shower bath; he is given a clean nightgown and his own clothes are taken away, properly marked, to be thoroughly disinfected while the owner sleeps.

There is little trouble to keep order in the dormitories. "Drunks are not admitted" is the word that has been passed around, and those who are given shelter are glad enough to get into bed and drop off to sleep without even a word to their neighbors. While the men are sleeping above, the first floor and basement are the busiest places imaginable. The information that has been given by the applicants for shelter is being placed on cards for the card catalogue, and the records of those who have applied before is being looked up. Letters are written to the person given as the last employer, asking for information about the man. In a surprising number of cases it is found that the men have given absolutely correct information. According to law, no one may get lodging for more than three nights in one month.

In the morning those about whom there is no doubt are allowed to pass out, after their breakfast of oatmeal, bread and coffee. The others are questioned by the superintendent, William C. York. A few who may be classed as suspicious characters are sent to court for further investigation. He says that most of those who apply for shelter are honest people, who have been forced into the tramp class when out of work.

"This place is a barometer of business conditions," said Mr. York. "In hard times people come here in crowds; when times are good we have comparatively few to look after. I know people often say, 'Why don't these men go and get work?' Well, where are they going to get it? I know hundreds of men who would jump at anything if they could find it."

About three years ago a man applied for a night's lodging whose face struck Mr. York as intelligent and above that of many who passed his desk. He gave the man a position among the unpaid help. He did well and was promoted, after some time, to a position paying $10 a month. Then he was advanced to $25. This enabled him to get a good looking suit, and he obtained employment in a large department store. He was promoted from one position to another until he now holds the coveted post of buyer, with a salary of $6,000 a year. He often says, "Everything I have got in this world I owe to the man at the head here, who gave me a chance."

The women's department is smaller than that of the men, as about fifteen men apply for help to one women who asks shelter. The women, for the most part, are not "bad 'uns," as the kind-hearted matron puts it. Most of them have lost places on account of illness, or the natural breadwinner of the family has either died or deserted his wife. One night last month a mother knocked timidly at the door. A baby was in her arms and six little children were tugging at her skirts. "My man has killed himself—out of work," was the whispered exclamation, and without further delay they were taken to the second floor and cared for over night.

If the visitor walks between the row of white beds, after the women are in for the night, the faces on the pillows will haunt the mind for many a day to come. There may be sixty in the room; a few will show the marks of "the pace that kills," the others sorrow, hunger, hopelessness. One young woman, overcome with the thought that she is at last upon the bounty of the city, has wrapped the bedclothes tightly about her head so that even her fellow wanderers cannot see her face. The matron disentangles the clothes and passes on her rounds, while the girl turns her face downward to the pillow.

Over ninety thousand found shelter last year, when the panic was on and working forces were cut. The year before, over sixty thousand. This year, the superintendent hopes that this "barometer of the times" will show things improving by sheltering many less.

WALKING WITH JESUS

out your hand to me and say, "Brother, I have had hard luck; fate is against me." Is that all you have at the foundation of your life—luck and fate? Fate! Fate! Fate is the incoming tide that drowns the man who is bound yonder in its pathway. Fate is the avalanche sweeping down the mountain to the village at its base. Fate is the falling of the frozen snow-shrouds upon the lost traveler. Fate and luck are the smashing of the weak under the wheels of this modern machine we call society. Is that all you have to rest your life upon? God help you if it is!

"Luck is against you?" Let Jesus join you. And now listen: "My child, behold my hands; yonder is my cross, and near us is my grave. I reached the grave by way of the cross. The cross is empty and the grave is empty. Now I live; and because I live, ye shall live also." Is luck against you? Let me tell you that not a sparrow falls to the ground without your Father's notice of it. He knows the way you take. Let me tell you that your heart-throb is mightier in God's sight than the pulsing of the Atlantic tides; and the movement of the humblest babe gathered in this room this morning is more important, in the scheme of God, than the movements of the mightiest star. Let me tell you that you belong to the upper world, and not to the lower. Luck is for swine; Providence is for men. Luck is against you? Lift up your little life, up, up until it fits into the upper world and into the larger scheme; and even then you will not be able to read the fulness of its meaning until you cross the river and look back from eternity and forward into eternity. Then you will understand, because you will know, even as God knows you.

Your prayer meeting, my brother preacher, is a failure. The deacons make long speeches and interminable prayers, neither of which mean anything; and you have to sing hymns to fill in the gaps. None of the young people will come to prayer meeting, and nobody else will come if they can help it, and you are discouraged. What do you talk about? "Why, I am preaching on up-to-date themes to catch the crowds. They will not come unless I do this." But the net result of your series of sermons is somewhat depressing to the spiritual life of the community, and it is certain that Jesus did not join you. Why should he? He has business to do.

Now look at this experience. Here are a couple of people that have been shut in and burdened by their sorrows, and they get together and begin to talk about the old days, and their sorrows and their joys, and then they talk about Jesus. Lo! He is standing beside them.

A little prayer-meeting gathering in some obscure place: There are only three or four people; and one deacon gets up, with tears in his eyes, and says: "Oh, brethren, this week I have had such a blessed experience in my own life—Jesus came near me." Lo! He comes instantly through the door and stands beside that deacon. And the minister says: "Brethren, we have had a hard time in our church this week, but, somehow or other, it has brought me nearer the Lord, and I love him better to-night than ever before;" and Jesus takes his stand beside him. And a poor woman gets up and says: "I have been working hard this week every day, and I am tired, but I want to tell you something beautiful that happened to me;" and Jesus is beside her. So the hour goes, and it is a foretaste of heaven; and when they come together afterward, they wonder why their hearts burned within them. No mystery. When we begin to speak about Jesus, he joins us and goes with us. That is a fact. Take it into your heart to-day—believe it. It will settle the problem of your dead prayer meeting, and your empty church. It will settle the problem of your cold and barren life. It will settle the problem of your shadowed and sorrowful experience. It will bring to you that distant heaven, and enshrine it within the depths of your own spirit.

"And as they journeyed and communed and reasoned together, Jesus joined them and went with them."

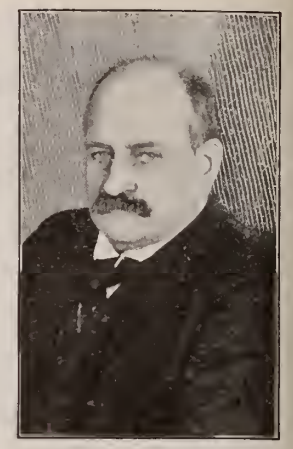
A Missionary Bishop on the Canadian Frontier



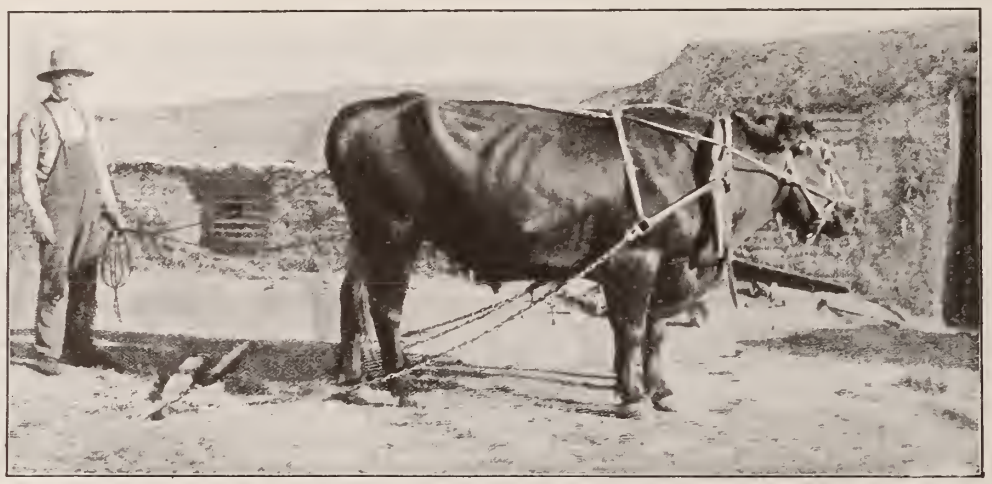
Col. A. D. Davidson
Originator of the American Invasion

By HERBERT VANDERHOOF

Author of "The Hillmen," "Stories of the Trail," etc.

WITHIN the last few years well up to a half-million Americans have been drawn across the Canadian border, mainly into Saskatchewan and Alberta. Those who come do not return. The loss to the United States is not appreciable, because population there is growing in a rising yearly percentage, and the farms given up by the migrants are not left vacant. When an American farmer moves, he first sells his old farm, and the buyer moves in.

But the gain to Canada is undeniably great. The American does not have to change his language, his customs, his church affiliations, nor essentially his manner of living when he crosses the line. He finds pretty much the same laws, the same schools for his children, the same churches, the same market facilities, and, generally speaking, the same institutions he left behind him. As a rule, he comes first himself, selects his neighborhood and buys his land. He is not an immigrant in the old sense that meant moving in droves, or taking wide chances in unknown wilds. There is no trek of the prairie schooner. The American who crosses to Canada is not a rich man, but he is not poor, as his father or grandfather was, when the Western States were in relatively the same condition Canada is in to-day. He has goods and gear, usually some live stock, and always money enough to start him well in his new home. And he comes to that new home in a railway train, not infrequently in a Pullman parlor or palace car.



The Canadian Settler's First Home

There are many considerations besides those of a merely material nature back of the movement into Canada. Broadly, they might be called sociological, but not in the ordinary theoretical sense. Fundamentally, and with conscious purpose, it is a movement for the creation of new homes. The essentials that make for family life at the highest average are the first care of every group of new arrivals: church, school, and the upholding of law.

The first of these, the church, goes with the tide of settlement of its own accord. The missionary bishop is always on the frontier; worship is established wherever a few of any faith are gathered together. The Sunday School not infrequently precedes the public school, and is never, in any case, very far behind it. In the natural tendency of a superior people to work with a union of forces, they all pull together. The missionary bishop, and after him the neighborhood clergymen, of whatever sect, refrain from interference with people of other shades of belief. They go farther; their cause being common in its one high aim, they and their followers are mutually helpful. In Western Canada, sectarianism has no claws. Church property is not taxed. In nearly all Canadian municipalities real estate held by religious bodies is entirely exempt, even from school taxes. In this exemption it stands alone. Church property is the only kind that is not required to contribute even to the educational fund.

The western provinces of Canada are like the Middle and Western States in their public school policy, with this difference: that schools are a first care of the provincial and Dominion governments. Whenever in any freshly opened region there are four actual residents in a district five miles square, and twelve children between the ages of five and sixteen years, the government plants a school and provides a teacher. The only requirement is that there shall be an annual average of six pupils in attendance. In such localities there is a yearly land tax of $2 to $2.50 on each 160 acres. The only other tax levy is for schools. While the establishment of schools is a care of the provincial governments, the districts and their management are in the hands of the people, and the school offices are elective. The organization of a school district is almost invariably the first political act of a new neighborhood. The process is set in motion by a petition from the people of a district, on which the authorities act. The right is retained to remove incompetent district officials, but it has seldom been found necessary to employ it, and the power continues with the people. Almost a thousand of these school petitions have been favorably acted upon in Saskatchewan alone since September, 1905. The school tax is a charge upon bachelors as well as upon heads of families, but until a district is able to take care of itself the government meets the deficiencies. No distinctions are allowed between pupils as touching countries of origin or the languages spoken. Schools are provided, the children must go to them—and the teaching is in English.

Not so very far back the people of Canada had nervous doubts of what the future citizenship would be. They talked about "the American invasion," and feared its effect. Sometimes they went so far as to call it a peril. All those doubts and fears have passed away. The country is becoming Americanized, but Canadians realize that, in the main, the new traits evolved in the process are the very traits most needed in any growing country. Calgary has all the hustle and enterprise of an American city. This is true also of most of the towns along the great railways. On the farms, methods have improved, operations have broadened, and people have learned to go directly after that prime American object which is known as "results." The provincial governments have wisely and with patient thoroughness backed up this pursuit. Farming has been made a science. The best expert knowledge in the world is brought to every farmer's door.

AMONG THE FILIPINO FARMERS

A Coast Scene at Cebu

AT a short distance from the city of Cebu there stands an old-time, honored monument, erected by the Spaniards to Magellanes, who was the discoverer of the Philippine Islands. The monument marks where the brave Spaniard fell, over three hundred years ago. A few weeks ago, another monument was erected in Cebu. It was a monument to another hero, who had fallen in service for his King. This time, many hundreds of Protestant Filipinos contributed toward the expense of the erection, and on the day of its completion great numbers gathered from the towns and villages, and there commemorated the martyrdom of their fellow-Christian, who, a short twelve months before, had been cut to pieces on that spot for his faith in Christ.

Songs of praise to God, and voices of those who preached the Gospel of the Saviour filled the village of Santander. The widow and her orphaned children were cheered by the love and respect of their fellow-Christians.

Since the arrival of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD mission boat last year the work of evangelization has progressed wonderfully in Cebu. There are, in and around the island, many more hundreds of happy homes and hearts, where Jesus is honored, than there were some eight months ago. During this past year about twenty-five new places have been opened up to the Gospel. The photograph will show you a group of mountain people who heard the Gospel from Mr. Jansen's and his native fellow-workers' lips some five years ago. They represent families in the mountain farms, some twenty-five or thirty miles' distance from Cebu city. Several belong to families of Pulijanes, who, through the Gospel, left their wretched life of wandering and plunder. These men and their families have persevered in pure and peaceful lives since they accepted Christ as Saviour and King.

On the seashore, beneath the shade of the cocoanut palm trees, these men and women gather to study God's Word and sing his praises with us. The transforming power of the teachings of Christ is seen in very many ways in the lives of these once ignorant people. As an instance of this, two poor women, both widows and both with families dependent upon them, brought us some money which they had borrowed from us about four years ago, at the close of a terrible famine. Not having grain to sow their small farms, they made the long journey to Cebu and returned with the needed corn. It took the poor women all those years, little by little, to save the amount they had borrowed and which they now sought honestly to return. This is only one of many such incidents, showing the change wrought by the Gospel.

It would give us joy to hear that our CHRISTIAN HERALD friends had wiped out the balance of debt which still remains on the mission boat. It is doing splendid service for the Gospel in the Philippines, and it will bring happiness to the hearts of the workers when we know that you have lifted the burden and that the mission boat and its equipment are absolutely without encumbrance.

Cebu, P. I. E. WHITE JANSEN.

[The missionary who writes the foregoing letter, Mrs. Elizabeth White Jansen, refers to the fact that a balance of several hundred dollars of the purchase and equipment money for the mission launch is still unpaid. Contributions to help liquidate this indebtedness, and make the boat free of all claims, will be welcomed by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and duly acknowledged in its columns.]

Mountain People at the Cebu Mission

It is apparent now that the beginning of the American settlement of Western Canada was carefully planned, with a far look ahead. The railway companies needed new people in the country to furnish traffic. But since traffic must depend upon the prosperity of the people, the railways were careful from the first to invite none but those who had shown their own ability to take care of themselves. The railway campaign for settlement was carried on among successful farmers in the best parts of the West and Middle West. Americans were wanted; and though agencies were also set at work in Great Britain, the main work was in the States. No secret has ever been made of the purpose in view. Mr. John S. Dennis, head of the colonization department of the Canadian Pacific, has declared: "The railway company must create prosperous homes to serve its real end. There is no room for the chronic 'failure' in the scheme of railway development by colonization. Such a colonist occupies valuable space that would be traffic-producing in other hands. His presence also discourages others. In fact, he is not wanted."

The Americans who came to Canada were chosen from among the best and strongest. God-fearing, sober, enterprising folk, having wherewithal to secure a stake in the country, they have mingled with the people already here, and formed communities and neighborhoods of quality as high as any in the world. One of the reasons why so many more Americans come to Canada every year is that they know they are coming among people of their own kind. They are going to have "good neighbors."

To be desirable in the fullest degree, neighborhoods need more than good neighbors. They must have transportation, market towns, and the conveniences of living. The plan of the railways has included these. Towns are platted at intervals when the lines are surveyed, and, as the settlers come, so also come the storekeepers. Some of these towns soon grow into little cities, with manufactories as well as trading establishments. The American tendency is also toward these places. In a recent interview Charles M. Hays, president of the new Grand Trunk Pacific, pointed out a fact significant of that tendency. "A good many industrial factories have been established in the West," said Mr. Hays, "some of them Canadian, but the majority backed by American capital." The invitation to American capital is natural, and of its kind as persuasive as the call to the farmer. "In all of the towns, of course," Mr. Hays adds, "there is room for undertakings dealing with the necessities of the people, such as dry goods stores, drug stores, hardware and other stores, and where the services of artisans of every description, such as carpenters, bricklayers and skilled laborers generally, can find employment."

Mr. James J. Hill has sufficiently appreciated the diversion of Canadian trade from American channels to have suggested the abolition of custom houses all along the border—running a steam roller over the barriers. But Canada has discovered prosperity in keeping her trade to herself, the diversity of production and markets being about the same as in the Northern States. This is working out nationhood for Canada, by making the country strong within herself and able to take care of all the work of all her people. In an address recently delivered at Vancouver, Mr. D. D. Mann, vice-president of the Canadian Northern Railway, stated it very clearly. He said:

"Varied interests are essential to national greatness. The upbuilding of our manufacturing interests is the most potent factor in the development of our home market. Every ton of steel, every locomotive, as well as every other commodity that is made in Canada, tends to national prosperity. My wish is that Canadian labor may be the best employed, the best fed and the best paid that the world knows, believing as I do that upon the contentment, the home life and the education of the great common people of this country rests the future welfare of this Dominion."

Whether sensibly or insensibly, it is a fact that the situation created under this policy has drawn and is drawing to Canada from the States an increasing number of people who are not farmers, but who come as the farmers do, to find or found new homes, with the wider opportunities of a country that for all its rapid progress is still in the process of making. Yet the major inflow is to the farms.

It is to be noted that while all these new comers from the States are American born, most of them the descendants of several native generations, there are many whose parents came to the Western States from central and eastern Europe, bringing with them their customs and creeds. For example, there are Mennonite communities from Nebraska and Kansas, who came to Canada because there was not land enough to be had for them and for their children. These were originally a German people, but only their worship remains in the German tongue. They are as thoroughly American, in all but that vestigial particular, as any other people of the West.

The high tone of public morality in this country of home-builders has an interesting bearing upon what in the States is called the temperance question. The saloon, as it is known there, is unknown in Western Canada. The traffic in liquor is conducted under the strictest control. There has been no "liquor problem," because there have been no "liquor men" on whom to raise it. There can be no saloon domination where there are no saloons. That hiatus is the most un-American thing in the whole Canadian West.

The rest is becoming more and more American, but the change is not a "peril," nor a conquering invasion of this big, new West. It is a part of an awakening of the land by a people who carry with them all the elements of a solidarity more American than one may find in most of the States themselves. The Englishman who first filled the air with "alarums and excursions" over the incoming rush from the United States finds himself now at one with his new neighbor in all essentials. With a seriousness that looks like unconscious humor, he resents the monopoly of the American name by the people of the United States, and is beginning to insist that he, too, shall be called an American first, and after that a Canadian, if you like. Insensibly he has absorbed much that is good from the invader whom once he feared, but who has turned out to be less an invader than a friend, a new neighbor, quite as comfortable and probably more helpful than though he had been native-born. There has been an easy and early adjustment of both to new levels, possibly higher than either had occupied before—having reference, that is, to the changed environment. The result is an atmosphere alive with the keenest and most progressive Americanism, but tempered with the solidarity and earnestness of the English character and its devotion to the three fundamental things: church, state and school.

Those who know the peoples of Continental Europe are well aware that their desire to emigrate is in a ratio inverse to their ability. It is the understrata that want to move; the weaker and the poorer, not the strong, the educated, the well-fed. In the United Kingdom this rule loses power. In the United States it is unknown, unheard of. The best it is that moves. Ambition, cramped by surroundings grown old, though never so comfortable, stirs the uneasy soul. The young look to a wider future for themselves, the old, to a wider future for their children. And all look to a free life in a free land, to the lure of new conditions, new opportunities, such as in thickly settled countries exist no more. The emigration to Canada is a selected movement of those who have, and in that it offers a wide contrast with all that went before it, for the others were movements of hordes that had not.

The New Cabinet

PRESIDENT TAFT is characteristically prompt in his way of doing things. Usually the selection of a Cabinet is one of the most trying tasks a new President has to undertake. It is related of Lincoln that he chose his Cabinet the night after election, before he went to sleep. Long before Inauguration Day, Mr. Taft had thought out his problem and decided who were to be the heads of the various departments. When solicitous friends asked him whether he did not feel just a trifle anxious, he is reported to have replied, with the blandest of smiles, "Why, no; I have my inaugural ready, and the Cabinet is all made up. There is nothing left for me to worry about."

That his choice of a Cabinet was a good one is evidenced by the popular approval with which the names have been everywhere received. Philander C. Knox, of Pennsylvania, the new Secretary of State, is in his fifty-sixth year. A brilliant lawyer, he vindicated his reputation for statesmanship in the Cabinets of Presidents McKinley and Roosevelt, leaving the latter post when chosen United States Senator from Pennsylvania. He is thoroughly familiar with our diplomatic relations and affairs of state generally. Franklin MacVeagh, of Illinois, Secretary of the Treasury, was trained as a lawyer, became a merchant, and was the originator of many important municipal reforms. He is a scholastic expert in finance and a strong advocate of civil service and improved methods in the conduct of public affairs. Judge George W. Wickersham, of New York, the new Attorney-General, is a Pennsylvanian by birth, but an adopted son of the Empire State, where he has had a long and distinguished legal career. He is regarded as a high authority on corporation law. Jacob M. Dickinson, of Tennessee, the new War Secretary, is also a lawyer of eminent ability and was formerly president of the American Bar Association. He has served several terms on the Supreme Bench of Tennessee, and was United States counsel in the Alaska Boundary tribunal.

George Von Lengerke Meyer, of Massachusetts, the new Secretary of the Navy, was Postmaster-General in Roosevelt's Cabinet. He is a prominent business man, interested in many enterprises, and with a valuable experience in public affairs. Frank H. Hitchcock, of Massachusetts, who succeeds Mr. Meyer as Postmaster-General, has had a remarkable public career and has served in many important official positions. He was formerly First Assistant Postmaster-General and is consequently familiar with the duties of his new post. Richard A Ballinger, of Washington, Secretary of the Interior, is a lawyer by profession, a man of large experience and high qualifications for office. He was brought up on a Kansas ranch belonging to his father, and learned Latin and Greek while doing work as a cowboy. James Wilson, of Iowa, the venerable Secretary of Agriculture, retains the position in the Cabinet which he has held since 1897. He has the distinction of having the longest Cabinet service in our history. He is unquestionably the ablest man available for the place. Charles Nagel, of Missouri, who takes the Department of Commerce and Labor, is a Texan by birth, a leading lawyer, and has been actively interested in public affairs for many years.

It is, on the whole, a strong personnel—a Cabinet of ripe experience—which President Taft has chosen. Lawyers predominate, but the splendid public service of these men in the past is a good augury for the new administration.

The Revival of a Discredited Charge

ABOUT a month ago, Mr. Song, the Home Minister of Korea, made the remarkable statement that recent disturbances among the Koreans were fomented by the Christian missionaries. It is an old charge in heathen countries, where every attempt has been made to discredit these self-sacrificing men and women, who have given up all that most people hold dear—home, country, relatives and friends—to go to a foreign land to preach the Gospel of Christ. It would seem that this old cry had about died out, and it comes as a great surprise from Korea, where the missionaries have ever taught the people to obey the laws and the government, whether that government was native, or Japanese for the most part, as at present.

The Y. M. C. A. is one of the most active missionary forces in Korea, and one of its secretaries, now on furlough in America, informs this paper that there is not one word of truth in the statement. Jealousy of the spread of Western ideas and a wish for a return to old conditions, which are destined under modern teaching to pass away, are the causes which have doubtless led to such a baseless charge.

Prince Ito, Japan's representative in Korea, has informed the American Minister that the charge is groundless. Unfortunately, several Japanese papers have seen fit to take up Mr. Song's view, and attacked American missionaries in China and Korea. At the same time they say the missionaries in Japan have never caused trouble. Every unbiased foreigner knows that wherever the missionaries have gone the country has been better for their coming. President Taft, in his address before a church gathering in Ohio, said it was not true that our missionaries in foreign lands had ever caused our government anxiety, but, on the contrary, they had often helped to bring peaceful solutions of international questions.

After Inauguration

INAUGURATION Day has come and gone. It was replete with the patriotic enthusiasm, the oratory and the brilliant display that are the usual accompaniments of a change of administration. Even the tempestuous March weather did not dampen the ardor of the hosts that gathered in Washington to assist at the installation of the twenty-seventh President of the United States, although it somewhat dimmed the magnificence of the inaugural pageant.

Many reviews have been written dealing with the work of the outgoing President, but the nation had already reached its own conclusions and formed its own judgment of the Roosevelt administration. Its verdict is that he was a faithful and a zealous public servant, deeply patriotic and intensely earnest, fearless and not to be intimidated by friend or foe. His character was a combination of Peter Stuyvesant and Andrew Jackson, immovable and indomitable. In quick decision, in the number of his messages and in the multiplicity of his activities, he has established a record of his own. He has been quite as free with his censure as with his commendation, yet always impartial, according to his best lights, and so undeniably sincere in his purpose of public service that criticism of his occasional incongruities has been practically disarmed. Some of his recent biographers have denied Mr. Roosevelt the possession of the higher qualities that are usually looked for in a President; but although it might be said—to paraphrase the famous expression of John Morley—that he "had no ear for the finer vibrations" of statesmanship, yet his course on various important occasions fully proved his capacity for dealing successfully with difficult diplomatic problems. Whatever Theodore Roosevelt believed to be needed for the nation's welfare, that thing he did, whether it jarred friend or foe, rich or poor, his own party or its rival. He was the tireless enemy of corruption, and his administration has done much to quicken the public conscience. If his judgments were at times too sweeping and indiscriminate, and the blow fell where it was undeserved, even this was condoned for the sake of the stern integrity of the man who cared for nothing but the confidence of the people and the approval of his own conscience. In a word, the country knew him and trusted him, no matter what he did or how he did it.

His successor, President Taft, is not an untried man. His inaugural address shows him to be keenly appreciative of the need of many reforms, hitherto delayed. Conservative and tactful, his disciplined, judicial mind should now be capable of rendering the highest quality of public service. He is a temperamental optimist, with a practical capacity for harmonization, which may be expected to make itself felt in public affairs to good advantage.

Consecrated Gifts

IN accordance with our announcement, made several weeks ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has now refunded, as far as possible, the amounts oversubscribed by our readers in aid of the "Redemption Fund" for saving from heathenism the seven children of Jasper Grant, a native convert and preacher in Monrovia, Liberia, West Africa. This Fund, it will be remembered, was raised in response to an appeal by Bishop J. B. Scott, of the M. E. Church, who asked for $240 and to whom $300 was sent, the additional $60 being given for the purpose of providing clothing and other immediate necessities for the children—all of whom are girls. After sending the over-subscribed contributions back to all of those donors who gave addresses, we still had on hand a balance of $41.50, which could not be returned, as this sum was the result of a number of small, anonymous contributions. This balance we have forwarded direct to Bishop Scott, in addition to the sum already sent to him for the redemption, on the eve of his departure for Africa. We trust that this will meet the approval of the contributors.

As an illustration of the beautiful Christian spirit in which our friends have responded to this Redemption Fund, and as showing how strong a hold the love of God's work has upon the sincere heart, we quote a letter received from a lady in Whitman, Mass.:

> I see I was too late in sending my $30 to the redemption money. I want you to use that money in the best way you know. I gave it to the Lord; it is not mine. It will be easier for me to send the check back to you than to destroy it. Please let me know what I ought to do. If I send it back, must it be in a registered letter? God bless you in your good work for the Master. E. W.

We have advised the writer that her gift, though late, be sent to Bishop Scott for the benefit of the family whose little ones have just been rescued from slavery, as it is a moral certainty that the family is extremely poor and would be greatly helped by this supplementary and unexpected gift.

President Taft's Opportunity

By DR. E. D. WARFIELD, President of Lafayette College.

THE best possible achievement of the new administration would be the reduction of the expenditures of our government, for the Army and Navy, to a sane and sensible basis; the removal from the popular mind of all apprehension as to the policy of the government, and the reassertion by this great and God-fearing people of its faith in international peace by peaceful methods.

[The foregoing, which appeared in our symposium on "President Taft's Opportunity," in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of March 3, was inadvertently credited to another writer. It is due to President Warfield, of Lafayette College, that we should make this explanation, which we do with pleasure.]

Mrs. Sage Gives Many Millions

THE ninety millions of dollars left by Mr. Russell Sage are being wisely administered by his widow. Within three years she has given to various causes $16,000,000. The largest single gift was that of $10,000,000, which sum is known as the Sage Foundation for Improving Social Conditions. The proceeds of this sum are to be used for improving the conditions of the poor in New York. She gave the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, Troy, N. Y., $1,000,000. The Russell Sage Laboratory of this Institute is one of the most superbly equipped departments of mechanical and electrical engineering and physics in the world. At sixteen years of age, Olivia Slocum, now Mrs. Sage, went from her home in Syracuse to the Emma Willard School at Troy, where she was graduated. In recognition of this event, she gave her alma mater $1,000,000. She remembered Syracuse, the city of her birth, in many ways, giving $100,000 to the Teachers' College of Syracuse University. New York University received from her hand fifteen acres of ground, worth $300,000. She built a dormitory for Princeton University, worth $250,000, and a music hall and chapel for the Northfield (Mass.) Seminary for Young Ladies, worth $150,000. She gave to the Naval Young Men's Christian Association, of Brooklyn, $200,000, and erected a Y. M. C. A. building at Long Island City, N. Y., at a cost of $100,000. The International Committee of the Y. M. C. A. received from her $350,000. To the Institute for Seamen in West Street, New York, she gave $150,000. She gave the American Bible Society $500,000, on the condition that the same amount be raised from other sources. She recently contributed $250,000 to the Association for the Relief of Respectable Aged Indigent Females in New York City. She has given $300,000 to found an institute on Blackwell's Island for making a special study of the diseases of age and their prevention. She has been very generous to Sag Harbor, one of her summer homes. The Pierson High School in that place, which cost $125,000, is an expression of her benefaction. She bought a race track near the village for $50,000, and turned it into a park for a children's playground. She is building a Sage Memorial Church at Far Rockaway, where she and her husband spent fifteen summers, making a liberal allowance for the building and also for the endowment of the institution. She has also bestowed gifts upon institutions in foreign lands, among other things giving $75,000 to the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut.

Mrs. Sage is a true, sincere, humble, Christian woman, and every penny she gives is an expression of her love for her Master and her fellow-men. In her life and labor Mrs. Sage imitates the ideal woman described in the Good Book:

She stretcheth out her hand to the poor; yea, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy. (Prov. 31 : 20.)

Ruling Passion Strong in Death

Elias J. Baldwin, known throughout the world as "Lucky Baldwin," the celebrated gambler, died recently in his elegant home at Santa Anita Ranch, California. He was called "Lucky" because everything he touched seemed to turn to money. In the risks of business and of gambling, things seemed to "turn his way." It was learned, however, that it was not luck but native ability and a species of intellectual cunning. Baldwin's tactics had an illustration in the foundation of his great fortune. The Ophir Mine was one of the richest of the Comstock lode. Baldwin introduced an assayist into the mines as a day laborer, with the understanding that he was to report that the ore had been mostly exhausted. Ophir stock, which had been selling at a hundred dollars a share, collapsed at the unfavorable report and Baldwin bought in a majority of the stock at the low figures, making $5,000,000 in twenty minutes. But it was his life on the turf that made him notorious, where he almost always won by some kind of ruse. On February 22 last, the withered little old man, eighty-one years of age, lay on a sick-bed at his ranch, the sands of life rapidly running away. In one corner of his great ranch a racetrack had been built, and the holiday crowds were there to watch and bet upon the races. The sporting spirit was still in the old man, and, calling his betting commissioner to his bedside, he whispered: "Bet $3,000 on Jack Atkin to win the Speed Handicap to-day." The physician stopped the commissioner and said that Baldwin was too sick to win or lose, and that he must pay no attention to the order.

It is a pitiable thing for a man of intellectual ability, with death just at his side to take him away, to have his mind and heart full of a plan to make a last bet and make gain of his fellow-men; but his act is only an illustration of the great truth, recognized in human experience and in God's revealed will, that character, either good or bad, has a tendency to the unchanging, the eternal; that if a man or woman shall spend sixty or seventy years in doing wrong, there is the strongest probability that there will be no reformation; hence the necessity of giving youth and all the other years to a life of virtue and piety.

Billions in Live Stock

An important paper prints statistics of the live stock in the United States, which will interest farmers not only, but all classes in the country. They are as follows:

"There are about 4,053,000 mules in the country, valued at $437,082,000; 20,640,000 horses, valued at $1,794,052,000; 21,720,000 milch cows, valued at $702,945,000; 49,379,000 other cattle, valued at $863,754,000; 56,084,000 sheep, worth $192,632,000, and 54,147,000 swine, valued at $339,030,000. These figures seem to show, on an average, something more than a horse and a cow for every family in the country, something more than two steers, and nearly three sheep and three pigs, while one family in every five supports the luxury of a mule. This represents a total live stock wealth of $4,525,259,000, or a trifle more than the value last year of our national bank deposits."

These figures will surprise almost every one, for although it was known our country was rich in its domestic animals, few had any idea of the fabulous amount of money invested in them. It seems that the automobile has not entirely eliminated the horse or the mule, as there are almost $2,500,000,000 worth of them left. A scientific knowledge of agriculture, improved agricultural implements, economy and indomitable industry have made the United States the model farm of the world, and, although many of the young farmer boys and girls have flocked to the cities, where they find more company and excitement and a wider field for their ambitions, there are enough still left, devoting themselves to agricultural pursuits, to make a splendid basis for the best civilization that the world has ever known.

I had great possessions of great and small cattle above all that were in Jerusalem before me. (Eccl. 2 : 7.)

Pigmies in the Valley of the Amazon

Carleton M. Jones, of San Juan, Porto Rico, representing a company of Boston capitalists interested in the rubber interests of South America, has returned to New York, after an absence of sixteen months on an exploring expedition through the valley of the Amazon. There he found a village of pigmies, which he describes as follows:

For a week we traveled by canoe without seeing a human being, and then we came to the village of the queer little creatures, which I judge consisted of at least 5,000 inhabitants. They received us without surprise or emotion, due, as I afterward learned, to the fact that an immense feast of boar meat had just been finished. Men, women and children were so gorged with food, and with some sort of fermented liquor, that they were stupid and sodden and paid little attention to their surroundings. In a couple of days they were hungry again and active, and I had an opportunity to observe them more closely. Their average height is about four feet. They are misshapen, and their large heads and faces are ludicrously out of proportion with their paunchy bodies and spindly bowlegs. So far as I could determine the pigmies had no form of government, and it was evident that they were not warlike, because they possessed no weapons of any description. Many of the men had no forefinger on the right hand. The evidence of amputation was plain, but it was impossible to learn why the finger had been cut off. My guide spoke the language of several Indian tribes, but could not understand a word of the pigmies. I remained in the village a week and lived on a species of bean, mixed with maize, and boiled. We brought away a number of gourds and copper ornaments as souvenirs.

Among the Romans, in the period of their best civilization, a village of 5,000 such midgets could not well be gotten together, as it was their custom to take such malformed creatures by the heels and dash their brains out against a tree or dispose of them in some other summary manner. Among the Jews, physical blemishes disqualified a person for the highest offices in the service of Jehovah. Under a Christian civilization, physical infirmity and blight are a greater reason for human pity, sympathy and help, and if these pigmies have not yet had the light of the Gospel it will not be long before some consecrated men and women will seek them out, to help and bless them.

For whatsoever man he be that hath a blemish, he shall not approach: a blind man or a lame or he that hath a flat nose or anything superfluous, or a man that is broken-footed, or broken-handed, or crookbacked, or a dwarf, or that hath a blemish in his eye. (Lev. 21 : 18-20.)

Bible Used at Taft's Inauguration

The old Supreme Court Bible was the one used by President Taft in taking his oath of office on the 4th of March. This Bible, which has been in use in the Supreme Court for a hundred years, is a little leather-bound volume, stained and slightly frayed by the oaths of a century. So far as known, it has not been used in other inaugurations. The usual practice has been for the clerk of the Supreme Court to furnish a new Bible for the occasion, which afterward is given to some member of the President's family. There have, however, been several exceptions. Mr. Cleveland, at his inauguration, selected a little Bible that his mother had given him when he was a boy. Mr. McKinley took the oath of office the first time on a Bible presented to him by the negro bishops of the country. President Roosevelt took his oath of office with a Bible that had been used to induct him into the office of Governor of New York State.

The name of God may not be in the American Constitution, but the spirit of God is in it. We are a Bible nation, a Christian nation, and the Bible is the basis of our civil and religious life.

Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path. (Ps. 119 : 105.)

Questions and Answers

L. T., Portland, Ore. 1. Was Theophilus, to whom Luke inscribes his Gospel and the Book of Acts, a person or not? 2. Did Luke write all the Book of Acts? 3. Was the Book of Acts written after Paul's death? 4. Was Luke a martyr, or did he die a natural death?

1. Some commentators hold that Theophilus (the "friend of God") was merely a type and not a person, as all whom God loves are Theophili. This seems to be the view of Epiphanius and Salvianus. Erasmus believed Theophilus was a real person, and Ecumenius asserts that he was a Roman governor or senator, while Bengel says he was a rich resident of Antioch. 2. The authorship of Acts is, by almost unanimous consent, attributed to Luke. 3. Paul's martyrdom is thought to have been about A.D. 67. Scholars differ as to when the Book of Acts was written; they generally agree, however, that it was some time between 56 and 58 A.D. 4. There are several accounts of the death of Luke. Epiphanius says he died a natural death and was buried in Bithynia. Gregory Nazianzenus calls him a martyr, and Nicephorus gives details of his martyrdom, stating that he was crucified on an olive tree in Greece, when he was eighty years old.

E. Y. Some years ago I signed my name to an insurance policy, and spelled it "Elenor," instead of "Eleanor," which is correct. Do you think the company could lawfully refuse to pay the money?

No.

M. O. T., Bourbon, Mo. Where were the stones taken from that were used in the building of Solomon's Temple?

They were probably taken, for the most part, from the limestone quarries underneath the city, the passages and galleries of which are seen to this day, although some were no doubt brought from distant points, by land or sea.

E. D. J., Muskoka, Canada. A man and his wife were married in England and lived there together several years; then they moved to Canada, and later came to Missouri, United States. There the wife secured a divorce and married another in 1903. After her marriage with husband No. 2, has that woman any legal claim on husband No. 1 or his property? Can husband No. 1 lawfully marry again?

If the Missouri divorce was obtained according to the laws of that State, and if the summons and complaint of the wife in the divorce suit was served personally on the husband in the State, the divorce is probably good. If the divorce was absolute (that is, dissolved the marriage), then the first husband may marry again, unless forbidden to do so by the decree of divorce. The wife's rights in her husband's property, after divorce, are usually determined in part, by the decree, in the alimony provisions. But she has no rights in his personal property as such. She may retain her dower in his real estate. This depends on Missouri law. Ask a Missouri lawyer.

C. J. H., Fitchburg, Mass. Does the Greek Catholic Church allow, or forbid, its adherents to read the Bible?

It does not forbid the use of the Bible, but discourages private interpretation. One of the chief results of Protestant missions in Greece has been the increased circulation of the Bible.

Mrs. M. J. W., Jaquins, N. Y. 1. What are the facts about the King James Bible? 2. Do you think it essential for a person to belong to a church, when she is not able to attend? 3. Do you think it essential for one to partake of the Sacrament, when the person is unable to attend church?

1. In the seventeenth century England had three Bibles, viz.: the Genevan, the Bishops' and the "Great Bible," all more or less unsatisfactory. King James authorized a new translation in order that all the people might have a uniform Bible, and the Authorized Version was the result. 2. It should be one of the chief duties of life to belong to a Christian Church and to attend as often as possible. "Forsake not the assembling of yourselves together" is the divine injunction. A churchless life is usually an irreligious life, poor and unsatisfying. 3. The Sacrament is not to be partaken of except after due spiritual preparation. We have the warning that those "who eat and drink unworthily" (that is, who do not come in the proper spirit, who have given no evidence of repentance of sin, and whose hearts are set upon the world and its affairs rather than upon spiritual things) "eat and drink judgment to themselves." If, however, the person in question be very aged, or an invalid, and a believer, exception is made in such a case.

B. I. R., Porter's Sideling, Pa. Which of the apostles were called "Sons of Thunder"?

It was a surname given by Christ to James and John, probably on account of their impetuous spirit. The word "Boanerges" means, more properly, "sons of commotion," or "of tumult" (see Mark 3:17).

Mrs. W. M. B., Westfield, N. J. Is it possible for a person to be filled with the Holy Spirit and work on the Lord's Day, buying and selling, or any other work, to get gain?

Any work, except that which is a work of absolute necessity or of mercy, is a desecration of the Lord's Day.

W. J., Philadelphia. Please explain Gen. 7:2.

The distinction of beasts between clean and unclean originated in the fact that certain classes of animals only were suitable for sacrifice. This rule undoubtedly came into operation in the earliest ages and was afterward emphasized in the Levitical law. Clean beasts were taken into the Ark by pairs, every seventh pair being probably reserved for sacrifice. There is no basis upon which to estimate the total number of animals in the Ark. The Revised Version says: "Of every clean beast thou shalt take to thee seven and seven, the male and his female" (that is, of each species) "and of the beasts that are not clean two, the male and his female" (that is, two of each species).

W. A. S., Philadelphia, Tenn. In a recent issue, in an answer to a correspondent, you stated that there were three wise men—"Caspar, Melchior and Baltasar." Will you please give your authority for said answer?

These names have been handed down by tradition, which is the only available authority. They are mentioned by Bede, Spanheim, and other writers. Tertullian calls them princes. Another writer suggests that they were three as a symbol of the Trinity. Moroni varies their names somewhat, calling them Bithisarca, Melchior and Gathaspar.

W. T. C., Centreville, Tex. 1. In your issue of February 3 you mention passages in the Bible which are interpreted to refer to a lower order of pre-Adamite aborigines. 2. In Heb. 1:3, "express image of his person" is rendered by Dr. Cowant, "the impress of his substance."

1. The first query has been answered recently in THE MAIL-BAG. 2. The more accurate exposition is that by Professor Weiss, who interprets the phrase used by Paul to mean that "all the glory of God had, as it were, been poured out upon Him as the Son of his love; and for this reason the divine essence has found its perfect expression in him." He was not the semblance of divine purity, holiness and perfection, but divinity itself, with all its attributes.

P. A. W., Kingston, Canada. How is it that missionaries cannot be got to go out to preach the Gospel to the heathen, while so many are willing to preach at home? I for one should be willing to go anywhere in the world to be a missionary.

There is not a dearth of workers so much as of funds to send them and support them. When God's people fully realize their opportunity, and the high privilege they can enjoy, if they will, of helping to carry out the commands of the "Great Commission," there will no longer be depleted missionary treasuries. Fortunately, the situation is steadily, though slowly, improving.

M. L., Germantown, N. Y. 1. What is the unpardonable sin? 2. Can a person be saved by merely believing on the Lord Jesus Christ? 3. Is it possible for a person to have sinned so deeply that God will not hear or answer his prayers? 4. Do you believe clairvoyance to be a gift of God?

1. It is believed to have been attributing to Satanic agencies the work of the Holy Spirit. 2. The exercise of faith is the first step, and is essential. Good works, as the fruit of faith and the result of a Christian life, will naturally follow. Faith without works would not be a living and saving faith. 3. We can set no limits to the mercy of God. He is ready to save "to the uttermost." 4. Clairvoyance is not to be considered in connection with spiritual gifts, in the proper sense. It is a gift, or an accomplishment, very much resorted to by charlatans and others, who make a living by hoodwinking the public.

L. A. C., Pennsylvania. 1. What is the meaning of Luke 6:29, 30? 2. If my father wills me a property, and gives me the will to read and hold till his death, is it a lawful will in Pennsylvania? Could I enter the will to probate?

1. The meaning is that believers are not to do as the people of the world do, in giving way to anger, but are to be non-resistant. If a needy one asks help of us, we are to give without expectation of return. 2. Yes, if the will is properly executed.

Mrs. D. D. N., Rockport, Mass. Where can I find the texts relating to the "ascension of 144,000 Christians"?

The texts which many students of prophecy interpret as relating to the subject are I. Thes. 4:16, 17; I. Cor. 15:51, 52; Rev. 14:1-5; 24:37-41.

Mrs. R. A. McL., Chambersburg. Pa. The women in this vicinity are not yet aroused on the subject of woman suffrage. There are many subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD here who will doubtless care more about the advantages to be gained from suffrage after reading your recent articles on the subject.

It is by organization that the most effective work can be done for equal suffrage. Every small town should have its Suffrage Circle, in which the arguments pro and con should be discussed. Every county should have its Federation of these smaller circles. The great advantages sure to accrue ultimately to the church, the school and the home from the granting of the ballot to woman could thus be presented. Neither men nor women, generally, have been fully instructed regarding this matter. Pennsylvania women, especially in the neighborhood of Chambersburg, are requested to consider this matter. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD stands ready to help them in all expedient ways.

Rev. H. H. Leggett, Batavia, N. Y., apropos of a recent MAIL-BAG paragraph relative to the whereabouts of the Ark of the Covenant, writes: "After the captivity, Jeremiah is supposed to have taken care of the Ark of the Covenant. When King Zedekiah's eyes were put out Jeremiah took the king's two daughters and fled, and cared for them. In the second chapter, fifth verse of the second Book of the Maccabees, it is recorded as follows: 'And when Jeremy came thither he found an hollow cave, wherein he laid the Tabernacle and the Ark, and the altar of incense, and so stopped the door.' Some of the Jews followed to find the spot, but Jeremiah 'blamed them,' and said, 'As for this place, it shall be unknown until the time that God gathers his people together unto mercy'—Apocrypha."

M. E. C., Indiana. Is it a Christian wife's duty to go to places of amusement with her husband, who is not a Christian, and will seldom attend church with her?

This is a hard question. If you can win your husband to Christ eventually by accompanying him to any entertainment not absolutely immoral, the sacrifice might be wise and right. Men can usually be influenced by an appeal to their sense of justice. It is unfortunate to be unequally yoked with an unbeliever.

Subscriber, Mesopotamia, O. 1. How much time should a morning sermon occupy? 2. Where can I buy the sermons of Phillips Brooks and of Beecher, and a book of Bible illustration by Dore, Tissot, and others?

1. Few modern preachers take more than forty-five minutes for a morning sermon. Many of our best ones occupy even less. Write to the book department of John Wanamaker, New York, for the books mentioned.

B. M., Trenton, N. J. Who was the originator of Mothers' Day?

Miss Anna Jarvis, of Philadelphia, is said to have first given out the suggestion of a simultaneous observance of one day in honor of motherhood. The day fixed is the second Sunday in May. A white flower (emblem of purity) is to be worn on Mothers' Day. Every one is also asked to promote the day by giving a flower to some one else to wear. The white carnation is the chosen Mothers' Day flower. Its whiteness stands for purity; its form, beauty; its fragrance, love; its wide field of growth, charity; its lasting qualities, faithfulness.

WHAT WOULD YOU SUGGEST?

OCCASIONALLY in the past we have asked our readers to point out what particular feature of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD appeals to them most strongly, and the replies have been so numerous and uniformly satisfactory that we found them of great assistance in our Editorial Management.

The help thus afforded prompts us again to invite a general expression of opinion on a new matter which demands attention. It is this: "If we could make room for one other feature in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, what would YOU recommend as an addition to those already contained in the paper?"

In answering this question please use a postal card only, and write us as briefly as possible, and do not refer to any other business at the same time. A reply from you will be highly appreciated by the Editor and his staff, but we urgently request that you mail your communication on or before March 24, or not at all. That will enable us at a very early date to present to our readers the outcome of the canvass.

Remember: communications to be mailed on or before March 24

President Taft Takes Office

The President and President-Elect Driving to the Capitol in a Closed Carriage During a Furious Snowstorm

"IT was a moist drama," said President Taft, during the early part of the inauguration festivities, and all who had come to Washington to see him formally installed as President most heartily agreed with him. Washington had become accustomed to showers or even a light fall of snow during the week of the 4th of March, but nothing like the storm of rain and snow which swept over the capital this time has been seen in recent years.

The day before the inauguration there was a continual downpour, and the hundred thousand arrivals walked in water and slush over the boot-tops; but it was a good-natured crowd, though much disappointed that much of the ceremony was curtailed. Probably the greatest disappointment was experienced by Mr. Taft, who had to take the oath of office and deliver his inaugural in the Senate Chamber, instead of on the grandstand at the east front of the Capitol. This is the first time such a thing has happened in over seventy years.

Mr. and Mrs. Taft spent the night at the White House as the guests of the retiring President and his wife, and shortly before noon the President and President-elect entered a carriage, closed on account of the storm, and drove to the Capitol, escorted by a detachment of cavalry. The idea that the inaugural should be held in front of the Capitol had not yet been given up; but when the Presidential party arrived, Mr. Taft was persuaded that many of the elderly men who were to take part would run a grave risk, and reluctantly he assented to the plan of taking the oath within doors. He spoke a few words to the people before he entered the Senate Chamber. As he entered Vice-President Fairbanks declared the Sixtieth Congress at an end, swore in his successor, made a brief speech and gave his gavel to Mr. Sherman. The latter swore in several new Senators, and then the announcement was made that the oath would be administered to the President-elect.

Mr. Taft, escorted by Senator Knox, walked to the back of the presiding officer's desk, and Chief Justice Fuller followed. Mr. Taft was facing his family, as they sat in the gallery. He repeated each phrase of the oath carefully after the Chief Justice, in a voice which carried well to the farthest part of the hall. He then bent and kissed the Bible upon which the oath was administered. There was an outburst of applause, the Chief Justice shook his hand, and President Taft stepped forward to deliver his inaugural address.

In his address, Mr. Taft outlined the various reforms he proposed to support with all the influence of his administration. He said that he would hold up the hands of his distinguished predecessor, President Roosevelt, in the reforms the latter had initiated, and would make those reforms a prominent feature of his administration. They especially related to the suppression of abuses of power by the great railroad and industrial combinations carrying on interstate business; legislative and executive action is needed to render these reforms lasting and to reassure those who are pursuing proper and lawful business methods. As President, he would urge relief of the railroads from certain restrictions of the anti-trust law; at the same time, he would favor proper federal supervision and restriction to prevent excessive issues of bonds and stocks by companies engaged in interstate commerce. He would favor reorganizing the Department of Justice, the Bureau of Corporations and the Interstate Commission, for the purposes already stated.

He declared tariff revision a matter of the most pressing importance, and announced his purpose of calling an extra session of Congress to consider a bill which would secure an adequate revenue and adjust duties in a manner to afford relief to labor and to our industries generally. New acts of taxation may have to be adopted, and among these he would recommend a graduated inheritance tax.

Laws should be put into force to secure the conservation of our country's natural resources as far as they lie within the federal jurisdiction.

He considers it absolutely necessary, if we are to maintain our proper place among the nations of the world, that we should have "a proper Army, a proper Navy, and improved fortifications upon the mainland of the United States and in its dependencies."

Our citizens sojourning in foreign lands must be protected and our government made to be respected abroad.

Mr. Taft Greets the People Before Taking the Oath

The President on his Way Back from the Capitol

Concerning Asiatic immigration, he favored its restriction, but without unnecessary friction and by mutual concessions between self-respecting governments. Outbursts of race feeling in this country against foreigners should be prevented or punished, especially where such foreigners have a right by treaty to our protection and toleration.

President Taft then turned to the subject of currency reform. Our monetary and banking laws should be changed so as to secure greater elasticity in the form of currency available for trade and to prevent the limitations of law from operating to increase the embarrassments of a financial panic.

Congress, he declared, should pass a proper Postal Savings Bank bill. He hoped Congress might be induced to see the wisdom of subsidizing mail steamship lines to encourage our commerce.

He declared that the Panama Canal is making satisfactory progress. The lock system will not be changed. "The canal will certainly be completed in the next administration, if not before."

President Taft said he looked forward to an increase of good feeling between the South and the other sections of the country—an increase of tolerance in political views of all kinds. With regard to the negro, he said the Fifteenth Amendment ought to be enforced. Laws restricting the franchise by raising the standard of qualifications, so long as they apply equally to black and white, are to be encouraged. The President, however, frankly expressed a doubt whether negroes, as a class, were benefited by the appointment of negroes to office, especially in communities where race feeling is acute and liable to be intensified by such appointments.

He upheld the rights of Federal Courts to grant injunctions in labor disputes. He said "the proposition that business is not a property or pecuniary right which can be protected by equitable injunction is utterly without foundation in precedent or reason." He believed, however, that a new statute ought to be formulated, under which temporary restraining orders could be issued. There ought to be new laws for the protection of employees of interstate corporations, when injured at work.

As the applause died out and the stately ceremonial in the historic Senate Chamber came to an end a great silence fell on the brilliant assembly of diplomats and statesmen. Mr. Roosevelt stepped forward and bade President Taft an affectionate farewell. Both men maintained their composure, but many in the audience were greatly moved. As Mr. Roosevelt left the chamber he received an ovation equal to that accorded President Taft. A storm of applause followed him, and it was taken up by the crowds outside. Eight hundred men from New York formed to escort him to the station, and time and again he had to bare his head in response to the thunderous cheers of thousands who lined the way. Above the roar of noises could be heard the strains of the band as they played "Auld Lang Syne." Mr. Roosevelt was compelled to hold a reception to his friends and admirers who were at the station to see him off.

President and Mrs. Taft Responding to the Salutations

President and Mrs. Taft were escorted through the main door after the departure of Mr. Roosevelt, and entered their carriage to drive to the White House. They were escorted by cavalry from Cleveland, dressed in hussar uniform. It was the first time in our history that the wife of a President has ridden with her husband on the return from his inauguration, and the people were much pleased with the innovation. The vehicle was drawn by four beautiful bays.

Mr. Taft and his family hurried through luncheon in their new home, a home they were glad to reach, for the President says he has been "living in his hat for the last seven years." Then they went to the reviewing stand in the Court of Honor. About fifteen hundred people were on the grandstand at the back, stamping their feet in a vain effort to keep warm. Vice-President Sherman stood at President Taft's left, and, as Major Sylvester of the police rode by, heading the column and saluting, Mr. Taft turned with a twinkle in his eye toward Mr. Sherman and said, "Now, Mr. Vice-President, we're it." A large arm-chair had been prepared for Mr. Taft, but he preferred to stand and put it at the disposal of his aunt, Miss Delia C. Torrey, of Millbury, Mass. She is eighty years old, but pluckily remained to see the parade through.

Some of the regiments had formed in streets where the snow was over the tops of their leggings, and were very glad to sweep into Pennsylvania Avenue. The men marched splendidly, and the fifteen hundred sailors, who had sailed around the world, were received with cheers. The West Point Cadets, in swallow-tailed coats and big black shakos, were warmly greeted. The Naval Cadets were unable to take part in the parade, being held up by snow drifts on their way from Annapolis. In the evening there was a display of fireworks and the brilliant inauguration reception in the Pension Building.

THE bell of Time has rung down the curtain upon the Roosevelt administration, and lo! all is changed at Washington. Stately homes have been closed, shutters have gone up, and the places that once knew their high official occupants know them no more. With the departure of President Roosevelt several Cabinet officers and many minor officials passed also, and new faces, new people and new homes come in with the new President.

It is surprising how far-reaching these changes are. A new President, naturally enough, wants his own friends about him, consequently the personnel of the employees of the White House undergoes a more or less sweeping change, and new secretaries, clerks, door-keepers and messengers appear at the executive mansion and executive offices. The Cabinet members are prompted by the same desire, and the same results follow in their offices.

Of the nine men composing the President's Cabinet seven are new members, and in many ways the Taft Cabinet is a very different body from that of Mr. Roosevelt. Perhaps the most noticeable point of difference is in the age of the men. With the single exception of Mr. Wilson, the Roosevelt Cabinet was composed of comparatively young men. In Mr. Taft's Cabinet the only man under fifty years is Postmaster-General Hitchcock, while three others are between the years of fifty and sixty; five between sixty and sixty-five; and one, Mr. Wilson, has passed his seventieth milestone. It is also said that these men represent more conservative ideas than their predecessors. Yet that is decidedly uncertain, for, almost without exception, all the members of this new Cabinet are men who, in their home States, have been known as reformers and more or less identified with what are known as the Roosevelt policies of reformation. A further point of difference is in the number of professional men in the Cabinet. Seven of them are lawyers, although Mr. MacVeagh, the Secretary of the Treasury, and Postmaster-General Hitchcock have not followed the profession in recent years. Two of the members of this Cabinet—Mr. MacVeagh, and Mr. Dickinson, Secretary of War—became Republicans in recent years, leaving the Democratic party on Mr. Bryan's first nomination.

The President's official family—the Cabinet Ministers, and especially their wives—are the determining factors of the social life of an administration. The President's wife invites the ladies of the Cabinet to meet her each Friday morning. They come in informally, the more industrious take a bit of sewing, and they sit and chat over plans of social procedure. It is informal enough, but they never forget their ranking positions, and it is pretty well understood that the decisions of the President's wife and the wife of the Secretary of State are followed by the rest. As it is entirely within the volition of the First Lady to make as much or as little of her social duties as she sees fit, the action of a new President's wife is always watched with the keenest interest. There is but little question in this regard concerning Mrs. Taft. She is well fitted to fill her high position. Her tactful, cordial hospitality is well known in Washington.

Mr. Sherman, the new Vice-President, had been a member of the House of Representatives for twenty years when he was elected to the office of the Vice-Presidency, and he and Mrs. Sherman are as widely known, and have as many friends, in official circles in Washington as any one at the capital. They have three sons—Sherill, the eldest, is in the banking business with his father, and he has three little daughters; Richard Updike, the second son, is professor of mathematics at Hamilton College; and the third son, Thomas Moore, is secretary and treasurer of the Smyth, Despard Company, of Utica, N. Y. He is also married and has a baby daughter. The wife of the Vice-President is a sweet, motherly woman, but she has opinions of her own, as the following story which is being told about her illustrates:

A Cabinet Minister's wife was trying to persuade her on some point of social ethics. "You will do thus and so, won't you, Mrs. Sherman? I am going to do it, and everybody else will," she said, persuasively, to the future Second Lady. Mrs. Sherman's expressive eyes blazed for an instant, and then she said quietly, but with decisive finality, "No, my dear. Not if every other woman in Washington does it; for I do not consider it right."

Mr. Philander C. Knox was Attorney-General under the McKinley administration, and served in Mr. Roosevelt's Cabinet in the same capacity until he was appointed to fill the vacancy in the Senate from Pennsylvania, caused by the death of Mr. Quay. Thus both he and his family are well known in Washington. Mrs. Knox has always been a popular hostess in official circles. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Franklin MacVeagh, has for many years been a large wholesale merchant in Chicago, and is widely known as a man of affairs and a philanthropist. He was a graduate of Yale. Mrs. MacVeagh is the daughter of Mr. Henry Eames, late president of the Commercial National Bank of Chicago. They have but one child, a son, who is associated in business with his father. They are Episcopalians, and active in church and charity work.

Mr. and Mrs. Dickinson, the new Secretary of War and his wife, are members of the Presbyterian Church, and have always been identified with its various activities. For a number of years he has been the general solicitor of the Illinois Central Railway system, and they have been living in Chicago, but their country home is the beautiful Belle Mead Manor House and plantation, near Nashville, Tenn., and they are very warm-hearted and hospitable. They have three sons—the eldest, who bears his mother's maiden name, Overton, is married and has a year-old daughter, and makes his home on the Belle Mead plantation; the second son is also married, and is in business in Seattle, Wash.; while the third son, named for his father, Jacob McGavock, is in his first year at Yale.

The Attorney-General, Mr. George W. Wickersham, comes from New York City and has long been the law partner of Mr. H. W. Taft, the brother of the President. Mrs. Wickersham was the daughter of Cornelius Wendell, and comes from old Knickerbocker Dutch stock. She is a woman of high standards and ideals, a devoted mother, who has always held her family life and the duties and pleasures of her home first. She was born and reared in Washington, so that in coming here to take her place as Cabinet hostess, she is really returning to her home city. There are three children in the family—a son, who will graduate from Harvard in June; a daughter, who is married to Mr. Albert Aiken, a sugar planter of Cuba; and a school-girl daughter of fourteen years. The family affiliated with the Episcopalian Church, and are noted for their generous benefactions.

Postmaster-General Hitchcock is a bachelor in his forties, so there is little that can be said about him in an article dealing principally with Cabinet hostesses. He is a Harvard man, of good family, and, of course, ought to be a benedict. The Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Von L. Meyer, was Postmaster-General in Mr. Roosevelt's Cabinet. Mr. Meyer was our Ambassador at Rome and St. Petersburg for seven years.

Nearly all the new Cabinet members and their wives come from old Colonial families. Mrs. Richard A. Ballinger, the wife of the Seretary of the Interior, is a Daughter of the American Revolution, and her Colonial ancestors were among the early settlers of Connecticut. She was a Wellesley College girl and spent three years there, but instead of remaining for graduation she went abroad and studied and traveled in Europe for a year or two. She was gifted with an unusually fine voice and until quite recently was one of the most noted church singers in Seattle. In their church connections she and the Secretary are Congregationalists; she could scarcely be anything else, for her mother has been "one of the main stays" in her home church for many years. They have two sons, the elder a student at Williams College, where Mr. Ballinger was graduated, and a young son of ten years.

Mr. Wilson, the veteran Secretary of the Agricultural Department, will remain at its head a few months longer, to fill out the longest term ever finished by a Cabinet Minister. He certainly deserves the honor, for he has done a marvelous work for the farmers of the country since he has been in office. His daughter, Miss Flora, has been in Europe studying voice culture for the past four years, but has returned to take her place as Cabinet hostess as long as her father remains in the Cabinet. The Secretary of Commerce and Labor, Mr. Charles Nagel, is from St. Louis, and is one of its ablest lawyers. Mrs. Nagel is the daughter of Mr. John Shipley, another leading attorney of Missouri. She is tall, fair, brown-eyed, sweet and womanly.

They have five children—a grown daughter, three younger, and a little son. They, too, are Episcopalians.

The change in administration brings in many new hosts and hostesses, aside from those in the President's immediate official family. There is no doubt but that the Army and Navy people are going to have very much more recognition under Mr. Taft's administration than they have had for a long time. Everybody knows that Mr. Luke Wright was made War Secretary through Mr. Taft's influence, and his friend, General Clarence Edwards, has already benefited by that friendship. General Bell, Chief of Staff of the Army, was with Mr. Taft in the Philippines, and Mrs. Bell is most popular in Washington since they have been stationed at Fort Meyer. Colonel Bromwell was Mr. Roosevelt's Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds and Master of Ceremonies at the White House, and Mrs. Bromwell is one of the most successful of the Army hostesses.

The terms of thirty-one of the United States Senators, a full third of that distinguished body, expired on the 4th of March. About half of that number returned as re-elected members, but the rest came in for the first time, and this brings many new people into the Senatorial circle. In the House of Representatives, whose personnel is subject to the mutations of politics every two years, there are twice as many re-elected men as in the Senate, and an equal number who take pristine honors of membership. Imagine the changes this causes! New faces in Congress means new secretaries, new clerks of committees, new messengers, new door-keepers, new people all over the Capitol. No wonder the defeated member feels lost when he "drops in on Congress" after six months' absence.

Simply because a man is a member of Congress it does not follow that his family are social lights in Washington any more than it follows that, because a man has an unlimited bank account, he finds an open sesame to the inner circles. Brains, statesmanship and culture count for more than mere position and money, and therein lies the chief charm of social Washington. At its innumerable dinners, teas, receptions, one is continually meeting people who are worth while, men who have won reputations in statecraft, those who have traveled from pole to pole in the interests of science, writers and artists.

Among the hostesses who are holding these enviable places are many from the Congressional circle. Each Tuesday afternoon during "the season" Madam Representative is at home to her friends, and so is Madam Senator each Thursday. If madam maintains anything of an establishment her days at home are veritable receptions, where, with a bevy of assistants, she serves refreshments in a handsomely appointed dining-room, and receives all officialdom, and any of the people from the home State who chance to be in town and who want to see how "our Senator" lives in Washington.

Like the Cabinet hostesses, Miss Cannon, the Speaker's daughter, is at home on Wednesdays and her drawing-rooms are invariably crowded. The Congressional women took a new departure last winter. They formed a club, whose membership was restricted to the wives and daughters of the members of Congress and whose object was purely social. They leased and furnished an imposing house on K Street, and started out under flying colors and are meeting with great success. Mrs. James Breck Perkins, wife of the member from the Rochester (N. Y.) district, is the president of this club, and has many loyal supporters. Mrs. Fairbanks, with all her popularity, allied herself with it, as did also Mrs. Sherman, Mrs. Longworth, Mrs. Payne, the wife of the leader of the House, Mrs. Alexander, Mrs. Elkins, Mrs. Scott, Mrs. Burrows, and many other influential women of the legislative bodies. The club will be a most welcomed institution by the new members' wives, as it will provide a common place of meeting that will be of inestimable help in gaining a social foothold.

A FAMOUS PASTOR DEAD

THEODORE LEDYARD CUYLER, D.D., LL.D., one of the best known and most widely respected preachers in the United States, passed away at his home in Brooklyn on February 26, at the ripe age of eighty-seven years.

Dr. Cuyler had been a foremost figure in religious work and authorship for over half a century. He was pastor of the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, from 1860 to 1890. He was prominent in the organization of the Republican party in 1856. His many writings on religious and ethical topics achieved wide popularity, and his contributions to religious magazines and newspapers here and abroad are said to number more than four thousand. He was the friend of Carlyle, Moody, Gladstone, Dean Stanley, Daniel Webster, Horace Greeley, Abraham Lincoln, Henry Ward Beecher, and many of the great thinkers of the last two generations. In his autobiography, The Recollections of a Long Life, published seven years ago, he described his associations and conversations with the leading thinkers and statesmen of the world in the last fifty years. He was born in Aurora, N. Y., January 10, 1822, his ancestry being Dutch on the one side and Huguenot on the other. He was graduated from Princeton, and after a theological course in 1846 was licensed to preach. He held pastoral charges at Kingston, Pa.; Burlington, Vt., and Bennington, N. J., and in 1853 came to New York, where, as pastor of the Market Street Reformed Dutch Church, he attracted many young men. In 1860 he became pastor of the Lafayette Avenue Church, in Brooklyn, which, under his leadership, became one of the foremost churches in mission and temperance work and had a very large membership. He retired from his active pastoral duties at the Lafayette Avenue church in 1890, but continued active in temperance reform, Y.M.C.A. and Sunday School work, and various philanthropies. He wrote twenty-three books, the best known being Mountain Tops With Jesus, How to Be a Pastor, Christianity in the Home, God's Light on Dark Clouds and Heart Life.

Dr. Cuyler was one of the best beloved of ministers. His mental and spiritual activities were kept up undiminished almost to the last hours of his life. On January 10 last, he celebrated his eighty-seventh birthday. He had been busy for weeks at various meetings, which he addressed with his usual vigor. The whole morning of that day, and several mornings after, were occupied with letters of congratulation from all over the world. His geniality, his lovable nature, his sincerity and his deep evangelical passion for the good of humanity made him greatly beloved among the ministers of all denominations. His great motto was: "A house-going pastor makes a church-going people." But he was more than a mere preacher; he was an orator of profound ability, a mighty advocate of God's truth, and, as one of his intimate friends has described him, "he was a preacher who pleaded like a lawyer before a jury for the life, liberty and happiness of immortal men." Like Demosthenes, he aroused multitudes to march against the hosts of intemperance and all forms of evil. His sermons had a quaintness of expression, a directness of aim and an overwhelming power of appeal. He always had a message from God to his fellow-men.

The Late Theodore Ledyard Cuyler, D.D., LL.D.

The Rev. Edwin Whittier Caswell, an intimate acquaintance, relates the following incident: "Dr. Paxton, one of the professors at Princeton, was a very intimate friend of Dr. Cuyler's. Once the latter was speaking before the students of that university on temperance. He was showing that it was not necessary for a hotel to sell liquor in order to be prosperous, and he cited an instance of a temperance hotel which was doing excellent business. 'Not for love or money,' said Dr. Cuyler, 'could you at that hotel get anything to drink, as Brother Paxton can testify.' A roar went up from the students at the joke on one of their professors. Dr. Cuyler once said of Dr. Bushnell, who, after a severe illness, was walking out while he was still very feeble: one of his friends, meeting him, said, 'Why, Dr. Bushnell, I heard you were very ill.' 'So I was,' he replied. 'I went right up to the gate, and Peter sent me back again, to be better prepared for heaven.'"

Dr. Cuyler quoted with great glee Spurgeon's notion of the evolutionist's prayer, addressed, not to our Father which is in heaven, but to our father which is up a tree. His comment upon Carlyle was that Jeremiah, in his most doleful Lamentations, was cheerful beside him.

In his farewell sermon in 1890, he said: "Looking my long pastorate squarely in the face, I think I can honestly say that I have been no man's man; I have never courted the rich or wilfully neglected the poor; I have never blunted the sword of the Spirit lest it should cut into the conscience, or concealed a truth that might save a soul."

✳ Young People's Societies ✳

The Light and His Witnesses*

NOT long ago some great geographer was lamenting that the earth is nearly explored. Science and commerce are invading even the deep jungles of the tropics and the frozen solitudes of the poles. Soon there will be no more fitting out of expeditions to penetrate into unknown regions. Every region will be known.

Perhaps this is a divinely sent premonition of the way in which the field of missionary enterprise will some time be quite covered. In that happy day we shall hear no longer the pleading cry from every quarter of the globe, "Come over and help us"; but there will be a Christian Church in every tiniest hamlet, and the "Sun of the Soul" shall shine over every desert and every farthest sea, even as the rolling sun of the earthly sky.

But in order to hasten the coming of that good time every believer should be up and doing. No one can afford to stand idle. The laborers are always too few. Not every one can go in person to the foreign field; but he who helps to support the missionary is just as truly a part of the work as the missionary himself. We can all give of our money and our prayers.

Even as far back as the second century, a certain good Pantæus had a famous Christian school in Alexandria, and one great purpose of this school was the training of missionaries. Clement of Alexandria wrote freely concerning their work, and his admirable exhortations might well be quoted in our modern addresses to missionaries.

Who knows how much we of to-day are indebted to the missionary enthusiasm of these noble teachers, who, in that most immoral of the ages, yet dared to stand for Christ and the extension of his kingdom? Tertullian displayed only a pardonable pride when he said, in his address to the heathen of North Africa, "We Christians are but of yesterday, and yet we already fill your cities, islands, camps, your palace, senate and forum; we have left you only your temples."

It is admitted by many of our best scholars that one-tenth of the population of the Roman empire were Christians at the close of the second century. It does not seem as though we had made the progress since then that we ought. Are we making the progress now that we ought? If not, whose is the fault?

The fervor and activity of the Mohammedan missionaries may well be imitated by our own. It is true that the sword has played no insignificant part in their proselyting, as it did sometimes, in only a lesser degree, in the early introduction of Christianity. But true and loyal zeal has been the main factor in their work, and Mr. Zwemer says that "in spite of cruelty, bloodshed, dissension and deceit, the story of the spread of Islam is full of heroism. These men of the desert carried everything before them, because they had the backbone of conviction, knew no compromise and were thirsting for world conquest. Not Khaled alone, but every Moslem, felt himself to be the 'sword of God.'"

One great source of their strength is in their pride in their creed, though eighty per cent. of them cannot read their vaunted Koran, which they carry everywhere. "If they have done so much with their religion surely we can do more with ours; for before the pure life of our great Leader the mock majesty and the whitewashed immorality of Mohammed shrink in abject terror," says Mr. Zwemer. Let us learn a lesson from these devoted followers of another faith.

Great Missionary Books*

THERE is scarcely anything more distressing to the Christian heart than the statistics of the wealth squandered in our country in a single year upon needless luxuries. Millions upon millions for spirituous liquors and tobacco; almost nothing (when compared with those startling figures) upon the cause of missions.

The New Year Eve which ushered in this year of 1909 saw in the metropolis of our nation a wild and shocking scene. The whole city seemed to be upon the streets. Electric devices and great searchlights flashed out the world-wide change of date. The hundreds of hotels and restaurants were crowded to their limit. Tables in some of them had been engaged for weeks beforehand. Champagne flowed as freely as beer. In the dining-rooms of some of our most famous hostelries, where fabulous sums have been expended upon furnishings and decorations, elegantly arrayed men and women had to be expelled because of their boisterous drunkenness—in some cases they had to be carried away, being unable to walk. The streets in the vicinity of the great newspaper offices were lined with reeling figures. It was an awful sight. It was computed that the sum spent by these pleasure-seekers on that one night alone was upward of a million dollars. It was surely well up into the hundreds of thousands—and nothing afterward to show for it, excepting shame and confusion of face, loss and sorrow.

So it is not because our people are poor, that the cause of missions does not receive the support that it deserves. There is money enough and to spare; but, to the disgrace of a large proportion of our people be it said, the pampering of their own bodies, the indulgence of their own lowest tastes, interest them more, and enlist more of their time and their means, than does the noble work of our devoted and heroic missionaries.

We get culture from travel and from society; but, after all, the great, primal source of culture is good literature. It is that which most refines and uplifts us and awakens our highest aspirations.

If we could visit the different mission fields; could enter the meeting houses, often humble, which have been erected with infinite labor there; could hear the testimony of pagans lately converted; could see the change effected from superstitions and uncleanly, cruel customs, to the lofty standards of Christianity, then the dullest heart among us would be quickened and the most hardened would melt.

Most of us cannot travel to those distant regions. We have to get our missionary culture and its resulting fervor at second-hand, through books.

And what books are at hand for us! Many of our missionaries have been not only eloquent preachers and Christlike characters, but they have had the gifted pen which translates life into writing, and charges the printed page with fire and electricity. Some of their works cannot be read without thrill after thrill, from start to finish. You cannot lay them down without a burning shame in your soul that you have done so little for missions, and a keen resolve that you will help them more in the future. An enormous amount of literary force is now expended upon biography, much more than ever before. To many readers, no other department of letters is so fascinating; and the very grandest of all may be found among the lives of our missionaries.

The Formula is Exact.

There is no guesswork about the making of Ivory Soap. The formula is exact; so much of this; so much of that; so much of the other. The materials must be of a certain standard: the highest. Our chemists analyze them and see that they are. The analysis is not a perfunctory, "hit or miss" affair. It is exact.

The plain truth is, that if Ivory Soap sold for a dollar an ounce, instead of less than a cent, it would be no better, no purer than it is. Best, because purest, of bath, toilet and fine laundry soaps.

There is But One "Holeproof Hosiery"

It has the name "Holeproof" on the toe. Please do not judge the genuine by heavy and coarse imitations.

"Holeproof" is the original guaranteed hosiery. We worked 31 years to perfect it. No maker with less experience can make a hose as good. It is light, soft and attractive.

There are a hundred other hosieries with guarantees like ours. But you don't want hose cumbersome, heavy and coarse.

"Holeproof to-day costs the same as the common. You may as well have it.

We pay an average of 63c a pound for our yarn. Ours comes from Egypt. We use 3-ply yarn throughout with a 6-ply heel and toe. Thus we get superior wear.

We spend $30,000 a year for inspection. You'll insist on "Holeproof" if you'll compare all kinds. But don't say merely "Holeproof Hose." Look for the name on the toe, else you may get an imitation not half so good.

If you want the most for your money you must see that you get "Holeproof." This guarantee comes in each box of six pairs: "If any or all of these hose come to holes or need darning within six months from the day you buy them, we will replace them free.

CONVINCED

Woman's Interesting Experience.

A Md. woman tells how she was convinced in regard to a matter of vital importance. She says:

"Before I used Grape-Nuts I was almost a physical wreck. I suffered untold agonies from indigestion, could not sleep at night, was on the verge of nervous prostration.

"I finally purchased a pkg. of Grape-Nuts, and the one pkg. convinced me it was just what I needed. I gradually grew better as I continued to eat the food and my ills vanished.

"I can now sleep soundly every night, going to sleep as soon as I retire. I never have dyspepsia any more.

"Too much cannot be said in favor of Grape-Nuts as a brain food for school children—makes them rosy and active.

"It is just the kind of food one needs for that tired feeling, and produces a reserve force and energy which lasts." "There's a Reason."

Verdict of Wisdom on Intemperance*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

IT is the supreme reform to enlist the churches in reforms. Getting four Sundays in the church year for the Quarterly Temperance Lessons was, therefore, one of the greatest victories. Quite as important has been the introduction of temperance education in public schools. The next thing is to make these lessons more effective. For example, on March 28 let us not be content to repeat the lesson of last year—the injunctions that Solomon uttered as father and king three thousand years ago—but let us place upon that Scripture pedestal the wisdom of later ages, especially the newest testament of twentieth-century experiments that show the harmfulness of even an occasional glass of beer or wine. Let every child be shown what has persuaded President Eliot, at seventy years of age, to say that it is "inexpedient" for even a self-controlled gentleman to use intoxicating beverages at all. Probably the same experiments, mostly made in Germany, explain the recently reported adherence of Emperor William to the plan of abstinence. Equally conclusive observations in daily life caused Lincoln to sign, and urge others to sign, the pledge, and led President Taft, long ago, to decide that a wine-glass is right side up when it is upside down.

Dr. Jacob Chamberlain and the Serpent

I. The Wisdom of History

For a hundred years America has been the world's experiment station for alcohol. Earnest Christian men sincerely attempted for many years to reduce intemperance by preaching moderation. No temperance expert—none but novices—hope for anything from anti-treating efforts, or any other attempts to secure the moderate use of a poison whose most essential quality is that it creates an increasing demand for itself. Preaching moderation, even moderation pledges, backed by moderation societies, did not even decrease drunkenness; and all intelligent people are now aware that "alcoholism" is more to be feared—the chronic poisoning that comes from keeping the cells of the body soaked with alcohol like a log in the water—by daily tippling that never reaches what is commonly called drunkenness. Of course, one really begins to be drunk whenever his faculties are in any degree affected by the alcohol.

Equally conclusive is the verdict of history on the numerous and vain efforts to get revenue and restriction at the same time, by low or high license. Revenue and restriction are horses whose heads are pointed in opposite directions, and cannot possibly pull together. The Opium Committee, appointed by the Philippine Government, so reported in substance after examining the workings of all opium license laws in Asia, declaring that the prohibition law of Japan alone was effective in restraint of that intoxicating drug, which temperance societies should all include in the scope of their work, especially now when President Roosevelt has summoned all nations to an anti-opium crusade that promises to send that curse to join the kindred trades of slavery and piracy in the limbo of crimes against civilization. There are abundant statistics to show that crime has decreased two-thirds by changing from license to prohibition, even though prohibition is not annihilation when liquor selling is prohibited, any more than when murder or theft is prohibited.

II. The Wisdom of Modern Science

From the *World Book of Temperance we quote one fragment of a compilation of "Twentieth-Century Science on the Alcohol Question," showing the ffect of beer on the mental work of erman children:

"Dr. Paul Bergman (Die Enthaltamkeit, March, 1907), principal of a chool in Germany, obtained the conent of the parents of some of his puils to make a test of a small quantity f light wine upon the mental working bility of a class of girls, thirteen to fteen years of age. Shortly after aking one-half a wineglass of light ine (eight per cent. alcohol) the girls ere given a dictation exercise. They ade from one to seven more errors an they did before; it took them nger to think, and the writing, spellg and punctuation were considerably orse. There were more erasures. arallel experiments were tried upon e boys, giving them beer instead of ine, with similar results. The boys greed that the beer made thinking ore difficult. Among the results obained by Professor Kraepelin at eidelberg University, in testing the ffects of alcohol upon mental work, as one which showed that under the fluence of alcohol a man memorized) figures after 60 repetitions, while fore taking the alcohol he memorized)0 with only 40 repetitions. The exercises requiring the highest powers the mind were most seriously afcted by alcohol."

III. The Wisdom of Commerce

The exact experiments of physiolosts but confirm the practical investitions of business men, which showed, r instance, a few years ago, that lf the railroad accidents were due befuddled brains, for which reason stainers came to be preferred for ilway service, and like reasons led ore than half of the business estabhments of the United States to give eference, in selecting employees, to tal abstainers over the most modate drinkers. Recent discoveries, hich prove that a man cannot hear alarm bell or see a red light as uickly three days after taking one ttle of wine as if he had let it alone, ll make it increasingly difficult for drinking man to get a job in this age steam and electricity. Hear what r. Carnegie says to young men of ohol as a stumbling-block in the th to success:

"The first and most seductive peril, d the destroyer of most young men, the drinking of liquor. I am no temprance lecturer in disguise, but a man o knows and tells what observation s proved to him, and I say to you at you are more likely to fail in your reer from acquiring the habit of nking liquor than from any or all t other temptations likely to assail u.

t is appropriate to quote, in closing ts industrial section of our lesson, t story of a poor woman, who stood ar the magistrate who was hearing ase against her husband. "Drunk; rd arrest." It was quickly decided, b somehow the pathetic face of the man touched the judge, and he said ther: "I am sorry, but I must lock u your husband." She did not seem o who would be a deep thinker, but s there not deep wisdom in her sad al quick reply: "Your Honor, uldn't it be better for me and the ldren if you locked up the saloon al let my husband go to work?"

V. The Wisdom of the Fraternities

Why is it that liquor dealers are exded from the privilege of membersp, not only by most of the churches, b also by most of the modern fraterties—the Masons, the Odd Fellows, tl Ancient Order of United Workm, the Knights of Maccabees, the Tbe of Ben-Hur, the American Leg of Honor, the Fraternal Mystic Cle, the Catholic Benevolent Legion, th Woodmen of the World, the Modei Woodmen of America, the Order of United American Mechanics and th Junior Order of the same, the Orde of the Scottish Clans, and many me?

V. The Wisdom of the Athletes

In a recent walking match held at Kiel, Germany, the first four winners were abstainers. Among the ten prize winners, six were abstainers, and two of the others had lived entirely abstinent for months before the contest. Of the twenty-four abstainers who entered the race, only two failed to reach the goal; of the fifty-nine non-abstainers, thirty failed to reach it.

VI. The Wisdom of Religion

Hinduism, Buddhism and Mohammedanism are all known as "total abstinence religions." But for that fact Christian nations would in Asia, as in Africa, have "made a thousand drunkards to one Christian." Christianity is also a total abstinence religion—seen to be such more clearly since the Revised Version substituted for the old translation, "Abstain from every appearance of evil," the command, 'Abstain from every form of evil." Will any one say that a traffic and usage that, in the words of Gladstone, has "done more harm than war, pestilence and famine," is not "a form of evil"? If it is, we are commanded to abstain from all participation in it. Who can tear himself away from the resistless logic of Neal Dow, "No man has a right to do what, if all the world should follow his example, as some are sure to do, would produce more harm than good"? Let us not forget that Catholics, to an increasing degree, are with us in the fight against drink. Hear the word of Archbishop Ireland:

"Education, the elevation of the masses, liberty—all that the age admires—is set at naught by this dreadful evil. The individual conscience is the first arm in opposing it, but the individual conscience has to be strengthened and supplemented by law. The claim of saloonkeepers to freedom in their traffic is the claim to spread disease, sin, pauperism."

The picture printed with this lesson represents a missionary, Dr. Jacob Chamberlain, reading his Greek Testament in a forest of India, during a missionary tour. He did not see the serpent which hung over his head until he laid down his book. With a tremendous effort he threw himself sideways, and made a dash for the open. Taking a long roasting spit from his bullock cart, he re-entered the shed and thrust it through the serpent's body, fixing it to the rafter. He then shouted to one of his men to bring a cane. A thick bamboo was brought, and with it he showered blows upon the serpent's head until it was killed. The villagers were in ecstasies, as the serpent had been the terror of the village for years, killing cattle, and, in one instance, a child, and yet they had never dared to touch it, regarding it as a god. Dr. Chamberlain used the incident to tell them of another serpent—the devil—and of Him who had come to bruise the serpent's head. The Telugus listened spellbound, and were deeply impressed by the comparison. To such a serpent Solomon compares alcohol. He reaches down his poisoned fangs over the family table, where parents and children sip their wine or beer together. He reaches down from the gilded ceilings of the banqueting hall.

Let us make the week beginning March 28, when this lesson is to be taught in Sunday Schools all over the world, "Temperance Education Week," and have this lesson, or at least the verdict of science, taught that same week in all the public schools also, with the help of local doctors. And having reached all the children in the schools, let us reach everybody out of school by scattering leaflets in all the homes by the hands of Sunday School children going two and two, completing the campaign with scientific temperance education extension in the use of the municipal poster, originated in France, detailing the dangers of alcohol.

DIDN'T REALIZE

How Injurious Coffee Really Was.

Many persons go on drinking coffee year after year without realizing that it is the cause of many obscure but persistent ailments.

The drug—caffeine—in coffee and tea, is very like uric acid and is often the cause of rheumatic attacks which, when coffee is used habitually, become chronic.

A Washington lady said, recently; "I am sixty-five and have had a good deal of experience with coffee. I consider it very injurious and the cause of many diseases. I am sure it causes the decay of teeth in children

"When I drank coffee I had sick spells and still did not realize that coffee could be so harmful, till about a year ago I had rheumatism in my arms and fingers, got so nervous I could not sleep and was all run down.

At last, after finding that medicines did me no good, I decided to quit coffee entirely and try Postum. After using it six months I fully recovered my health beyond all expectations, can sleep sound and my rheumatism is all gone." "There's a Reason."

The Little Doctor

A New Serial Story, written for "The Christian Herald"

By AGNES LOWE ELLIS

DONALD enjoyed every mile of the way to Branksome, and his merry talk amused and entertained George much. The carriage from Maple Hall was in waiting when they reached the station, and soon they were whirling along through the village streets and out toward the bright home, where all were anxiously watching for them in the gathering twilight.

When Donald went running into the sitting-room, saying, "We've come! Here we are!" there was much happy crying over the little fellow. Aunt Dora, Aunt Phœbe and Lily in turn held him in their arms, rejoicing over the treasure returned to them so well, and in such spirits. Indeed, Donald was the only composed and tearless person in the room.

Bright and early the next morning the whole family were up, and Donald's merry voice was heard calling "Good-morning" here and there, all over the house.

Poor Elsie was almost beside herself with joy to think that he could run like other boys. She always closed her remarks, when holding forth on the delight of his being able to walk, by saying, "Oh, but the doctor is a wonderful man!"

After breakfast Mrs. Hunter told George that she wanted to see him a few minutes alone. When in the privacy of her own room, she described to him an interesting letter which had come from Marian, but added that it was rather mystifying in some respects. "What can this property in Mexico be?" she wondered. "I did not know that Squire Danforth had ever lived in Mexico. It is strange that neither he nor Aunt Phœbe ever mentioned it."

"Well, mother, he did not need to have lived in Mexico in order to own property there. Perhaps he had a plantation managed by an overseer, or he may have interests in the mining districts."

"Yes, that is all quite reasonable to you, who have not heard the letter read. Marian seems to be carried away by the wonders of that far-off tropical land, and is so loud in her praises of the country, and so enthusiastic over the history of the people, that somehow I fear they may go there to live."

George looked at his mother with a startled countenance, saying, "I hope not. Can I see the letter?"

"Aunt Phœbe has not read it yet," she answered, "and I understood from Squire Danforth that he did not think it best to tell her all his affairs, because her peculiar disposition led her to worry so much. Therefore I have hesitated about giving it to her. It would only afford an opportunity for her to wonder over, and ask questions about, what has troubled me not a little."

Returning to the sitting-room, she summoned Lily, who soon brought the letter, which George read eagerly.

It ran as follows:

"CHAMPOTON, MEX., March 5, 18—.

"MY DEAR FRIENDS: How I would like to see you all to-day! I can fancy you all as I left you—but alas! there is one vacant chair. The thought of it makes our hearts ache sorely. The sadness caused by the tidings in your last letter about dear Mrs. Fraser was somewhat relieved by the good news that Donald was almost able to walk, and would soon be well. My father and I both send congratulations to the dear child, with our warmest love, and promise ourselves many delightful visits from him when we return home.

What Will You Give To Be Well

I CANNOT tell you how happy I am that I have been able to bring health and strength to 30,000 women in the past six years. Just think! this means a whole city. It is to my thorough study of anatomy, physiology and health principles, and to my 12 years' personal experience before I began my instructions by mail, that I attribute my marvelous success. It would do your heart good to read the reports from my pupils—and I have done all this by simply studying Nature's laws adapted to the correction of each individual difficulty. If vital organs or nerve centers are weak, I strengthen them so that each organ does its work.

To Have Good Figure, Vibrant Health, Rested Nerves?

I want to help every woman to be perfectly, gloriously well, with that sweet, personal loveliness which health and a wholesome, graceful body gives—a cultured, self-reliant woman with a definite purpose, full of the health and vivacity which makes you

A Better Wife
A Rested Mother
A Sweeter Sweetheart

You can easily remove the fat and it will stay removed. I have reduced 15,000 women.

Too Fleshy?

One pupil writes me:

"Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I feel so well I want to shout! I never get out of breath now.

"When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all so easy, I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

Too Thin?

I may need to strengthen your stomach, intestines and nerves first. A pupil who was thin, writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman."

"My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion any more, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel so well all the time."

I bring each pupil to symmetrical proportions and I teach her to stand and to walk in an attitude which bespeaks culture and refinement. A good figure, gracefully carried, means more than a pretty face. Nature's rosy cheeks are more beautiful than paint or powder. I help you to

Arise to Your Best!

The day for drugging the system has passed. In the privacy of your own room, I strengthen the muscles and nerves of the vital organs, lungs and heart and start your blood to circulating as it did when you were a child. I teach you to breathe so that the blood is fully purified.

You Can Be Well Without Drugs

And the vital strength gained by a forceful circulation relieves you of such chronic ailments as

Constipation	Dullness
Torpid Liver	Irritability
Indigestion	Nervousness
Rheumatism	Sleeplessness
Weaknesses	Weak Nerves

Catarrh

by strengthening whatever organs or nerves are weak.

I wish I could put sufficient emphasis into these words to make you realize that you do not need to be ill, but that you can be a buoyant, vivacious, attractive woman in return for just a few minutes' care each day in your own home.

Individual Instruction—I give each pupil the individual, confidential treatment which her case demands. My information and advice are entirely free.

A CORSET IS NOT NEEDED FOR A GOOD FIGURE

Write me today telling me your faults in health or figure, and I will cheerfully tell you whether I can help you. I never treat a patient I cannot help. If I cannot help you I will refer you to the help you need.

Send me 10 cents for instructive booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly.

Music Lessons Free

IN YOUR OWN HOME.

A wonderful offer to every lover of music whether a beginner or an advanced player.

Ninety-six lessons (or a less number, if you desire) for either Piano, Organ, Violin, Guitar, Banjo, Cornet, Sight Singing, or Mandolin will be given free to make our home study courses for these instruments known in your locality. You will get one lesson weekly, and your only expense during the time you take the lessons will be the cost of postage and the music you use, which is small. Write at once. It will mean much to you to get our free booklet. It will place you under no obligation whatever to us if you never write again. You and your friends should know of this work. Hundreds of our pupils write: "Wish I had known of your school before." "Have learned more in one term in my home with your weekly lessons than in three terms with private teachers, and at a great deal less expense." "Everything is so thorough and complete." "The lessons are marvels of simplicity, and my 11 year old boy has not had the least trouble to learn." One minister writes: "As each succeeding lesson comes I am more and more fully persuaded I made no mistake in becoming your pupil."

Established 1898—have thousands of pupils from seven years of age to seventy.

Don't say you cannot learn music till you send for our free booklet and tuition offer. It will be sent by return mail free. Address U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC, Box 7, 225 Fifth Ave., New York City.

"How strange it was to read of your having sleighing at home, while we were suffering from extreme heat, unable, during the middle of the day, to go out at all.

"Before we left Campeche, we visited with our host a number of private houses of the better class. Some of these homes are very elegant, and are filled with rare old paintings and elegant statuary. Their courtyards are one bloom of beauty, each a veritable fairy-land.

"As we drove home from our sightseeing, we were shown a large number of vacant houses in a district which had been ravaged by smallpox.

"As we rode along, gazing at these houses, we all at once saw a wild-looking man shouting aloud and threateningly shaking his hand at us. We were told that he was crazy, and for once I saw a purpose in the unsightly bars of iron at the windows.

"As one travels on the outskirts of the city or in the country regions, he notices that the mile-stones or league and half-league marks are often shrines, and many times consist of a large pile of stones surmounted by a cross. We were seated at breakfast one morning, when a woman came in who had been an old servant in the family. Her appearance caused quite a sensation as she drew near to kiss the hands of her former employers, for it had been reported that during a pilgrimage she had been eaten by a wild beast.

"Here I am at the close, and have not said a word about our trip on the bay to this place. My father had to come because of some money interest in a plantation here, which he says belongs rightfully to me. Tell auntie we hope to be at home with her ere long, and that I am glad she did not care to come with us. She never could bear the great heat, nor the ways of the people, I know. With love to all,

"Sincerely yours, MARIAN."

When George had finished the letter, Donald came rushing in, exclaiming, "Dudley has come. Oh, I am so glad! He came sooner than we expected him."

CHAPTER XIX

YES, Dudley had come, and he received a warm welcome.

"My dear boy," Mrs. Hunter exclaimed, "I have been longing to see you. I fear you have been working too hard. You are looking thin."

"Am I? Why, my little mother, I think I never felt better in my life. I have been successful in a number of discouraging cases, and feel that it is a grand thing to live and to be of some use in the world. I may seem to be too enthusiastic, but although I always wanted to be a physician, I never realized, until this winter, the opportunities for doing good that are found in my calling."

"Oh, do we not have a living example of that before our eyes? How can we ever thank you enough for what you have done for this dear child?"

"It was a delight to do anything for him, and you may be sure that he did me as much good as I did him. He is always an inspiration to me. It was a kind Providence that led us to the park on that day when we first saw him."

"Truly it was a Providence, Dudley. Think how it gave me an opportunity to fulfil the dying request of my husband concerning Ellen. I can never be thankful enough for that, and for those months of loving companionship with her. It is true that I am again alone, yet this dear boy is left, a comfort and blessing to us all."

Donald went to her side and put his hand confidently in hers as she spoke, and she gathered him to the shelter of her loving arms.

Aunt Phœbe presently came in and was overjoyed to meet her favorite again. She insisted upon his coming over to spend all of the next day with her. She said indeed that she must have the whole family. The old place, she said, had grown so lonesome that at times she could hardly bear it. "You must all come now, Mrs. Hunter," she said. "Please do not say no. You can be muffled up, and our rooms are so very warm and comfortable that you cannot possibly take cold."

There was no use in trying to refuse Aunt Phœbe anything when she began to plead in this way; and it was decided that, as early as possible in the forenoon, they would all go over to "Paradise" and spend the day.

Aunt Phœbe was in her element at the prospect of preparing the two meals for which she meant to keep them, and went home to begin preparations at once. She was an excellent housekeeper; everything was in order from attic to cellar, and her store-room was always well supplied.

Dudley was shown the family letter as soon as Aunt Phœbe took her departure, and after reading it, he sat for a long time without speaking.

At length Mrs. Hunter broke the silence by saying, "I am afraid that our friend Marian is becoming too fond of that far-off land. I am jealous of the praises she showers upon it, and wish we had her home again."

Dudley seemed somewhat startled at these words; then in a moment he said, "You may have read something between the lines, mother, but I see only the admiration which such a picturesque country would be likely to inspire in a nature like Miss Danforth's. Surely she and her father would not think of settling there. They could not live in such a climate throughout the year, and I am sure that persons brought up as they have been would not care for the society to be found there."

"You have relieved my mind by those words, Dudley. I long to see her dear face again, and I wish that Ellen's prediction concerning George and her would prove true. There is no one whom I would so gladly call my daughter. She is beautiful to look upon, and, better than that, she has a lovely character."

"I heartily endorse every word that you have spoken," answered Dudley. "George has my best wishes for his success, if he should seek to win her; and I think there is very little doubt about his feelings in regard to her."

"I am sure there is not; I have seen this all along, and trust that my boy's life will not be saddened by a disappointment in this matter. Many beautiful souls are darkened and blighted by an unfortunate love affair; though sometimes such disappointments work for good. The hardest thing that a woman has to do in the world, I think, is to say 'no' to the man who loves and honors her above all women, and who would gladly lay his all at her feet. But it is the only way for her, when she cannot return the love offered. There must be strong and true affection on both sides, if there is to be any happiness in married life. Of the woman who deliberately leads on a man, only to spurn his love, and glory over the victory, I have no words severe enough to say."

"I think that, in these days, too little thought is given to these matters," rejoined Dudley gravely. "I see much of the life of different homes, in my work as a physician, and find many that are unhappy among both the rich and the poor.

"Of course, to an honorable physician, family secrets are sacred, but you would be surprised to know how many there are who recklessly unveil the innermost emotions of their hearts and lay bare to the eye of a stranger the heart-burning jealousies, cares and trials that should never pass the lips."

Think Right—Live Right

Are you perfectly satisfied with your present condions in life; or do you yearn for better things? Do you long for a larger life, greater prosperity, better health and more perfect happiness? Know this then: Your thoughts make you. Learn to think right and to control your thoughts, and your fondest hopes will be realized—your greatest ambition will become a reality. How to do it is the question; and the answer is: By reading our truly wonderful little volume just published, entitled "Thoughts Are Things," which contains six intensely interesting and fascinating chapters on the much discussed subject, The Power of Thought. Penalties of Intemperance

By Mrs. M. Baxter

DRUNKENNESS is of no recent date. It abetted the first dishonor of parents of which we read in the Word of God (Gen. 9:20-25); its fruits are sin of the worst kind. And God has pronounced this powerful woe to the drunkards: "Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink; that continue until night, till wine inflame them! And the harp, and the viol, the tabret, and pipe, and wine are in their feasts; but they regard not the work of the Lord, neither consider the operation of his hands. Therefore, my people are gone into captivity, because they have no knowledge; and their honorable men are famished, and their multitude dried up with thirst. Therefore, hell hath enlarged herself, and opened her mouth without measure; and their glory, and their multitude, and their pomp, and he that rejoiceth, shall descend into it" (Isa. 5:11-14).

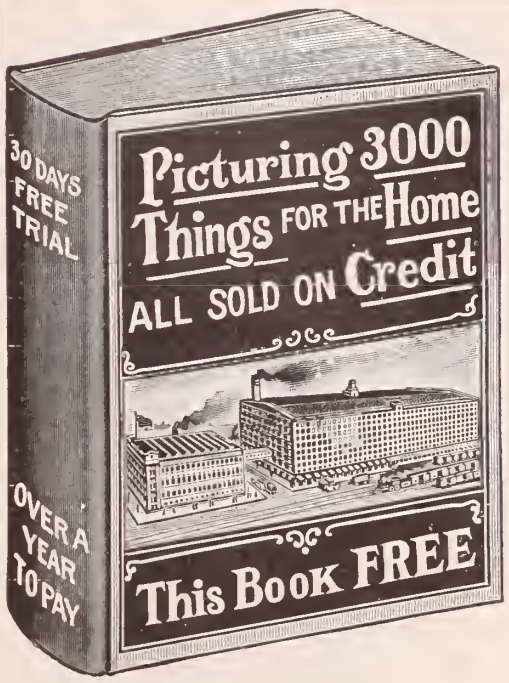
It is no light thing when God himself declares that "hell hath enlarged herself, and opened her mouth without measure," because of the drunkenness which is found upon the face of this our earth! But does he overstate the truth? Who fill our prisons? Is it not the drunkards? Who fill our lunatic asylums? Is it not the drunkards? Who fill our workhouses? Is it not the drunkards? Who fill our hospitals? Ask the medical men what lies at the root of much of the sickness and debility of those who are carried into hospitals. Is it not the drink which is often the cause? Yes; "hell hath enlarged herself." The words which come from the drunkard's lips savor of hell, the acts which come from the drunkard's hands savor of hell. Look at his home; his poor wife beaten black and blue, his poor children ragged and shoeless, his furniture broken, the panes out of his windows, the grate without fire, the bedstead without bedding. What has done it all? Surely the cursed drink, against which God utters his woe.

But God's woe goes out also to those who encourage others to drink: "Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink, that puttest thy bottle to him, and makest him drunken also." Drunkenness is contagious; one drunkard makes more. God says of the drunkards of Ephraim that their "glorious beauty" is a "fading flower," that shall be trodden under foot; and, alas! not simply common people have erred through wine, and through strong drink are out of the way, but the priests and the prophets have "erred through strong drink, they are swallowed up of wine; they are out of the way through strong drink; they err in wisdom, they stumble in judgment. For all tables are full of vomit and filthiness, so that there is no place clean."

Strong drink is in itself displeasing to God. "Wine is a mocker; strong drink is raging." And again, "Wine and new wine take away the heart." In the tabernacle the priests of God were not allowed to touch it when they exercised their ministry. "The Lord spake unto Aaron, saying, Do not drink wine nor strong drink, thou, nor thy sons with thee, when ye go into the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die; it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations." And the same command is repeated (Ezek. 44:21-23) in the prophecy of the temple yet to be rebuilt in Jerusalem. God's priests must be holy unto the Lord. Nothing hinders our sensitiveness to the Spirit of the Lord so much as being slaves to another spirit. Many a Christian who has been a moderate drinker has found that wine hinders prayer and communion with God; and though it may never have been a temptation to them as to many others, they are conscious that, for their souls' welfare, they were better without it.

WHO ELSE WANTS THIS DOLLAR BOOK FREE?

Our 1909 Book—Newer Styles—Lower Prices



THIS DOLLAR BOOK—now fresh from the presses—is offered free to anyone who has a home. Send no money, no stamps. Simply say that you want it, and we will send it postpaid. Here you will find pictures and descriptions of 3,000 new style things for the home. That is a greater variety than you could find in any retail store in Chicago. The pictures are perfect; some are in actual colors. And every article is a new creation. You can pick out things in this book, sitting by your own fireside, better than you could in any store in the world.

WE TRUST YOU FOR

Furniture, Carpets--Rugs, Silverware, Chinaware, Lamps--Clocks, Refrigerators, Sewing Machines, Washing Machines, Talking Machines, Pianos--Stoves, Baby Carriages, Draperies, Etc.

Every article in this book—large and small—is sold on credit. You can have what you want, use and enjoy it, then pay as convenient—a little each month. Yet every price is guaranteed lower than anyone quotes for cash. We charge no interest and ask no security. Our dealings are all confidential. A person who wants to make home more attractive is the right sort of person, and his credit is good with us.

OVER A YEAR TO PAY

Think what that means. No need to wait for the money. No need to go without things that you want. You can have them at once and enjoy them. Then you can take, on the average, more than a year to pay, so one hardly feels the expenditure. This is the modern way—the pleasant way—to buy house furnishings. In the larger cities more than 60 per cent of all furniture, carpets, etc., are sold on this plan. Now you can buy, wherever you are, on the same terms we give to people next door to us.

30 DAYS' FREE TRIAL

You buy nothing from us until you see it and use it for 30 days. Simply say what you want and we send it to you on approval. Use it a month. If you don't find the article satisfactory—don't find our prices lower than anywhere else—return it at our expense. You are under no obligation.

ASTOUNDING PRICES

Compare the prices in this book with prices at your local store. Or compare them with prices quoted by cash mail order houses. You will be astounded to see the difference. This comes partly through our tremendous buying power. It is also due to our being content with a very small margin of profit. We sell on credit exactly as low as for cash. And we defy any mail order house—cash or credit—to duplicate our price on even a single piece.

15 TO 50% SAVED

We know every price that is quoted by others, for that is our business. And we guarantee to save you from 15 to 50 per cent under any other price in America. If you find that we don't, you can send the goods back, for everything is sent on approval. We shall be glad to have you order elsewhere the same thing you order from us. Then return the one which seems to give least value.

500,000 CUSTOMERS

This is the largest concern of its kind in existence, with a combined capital of $7,000,000. We have more than 500,000 customers, and our mail order buildings cover six acres of ground. In addition, we own 25 mammoth retail stores in the heart of the largest cities. Thus we control the output of scores of great factories, and sell direct to the user. It would be folly for any smaller concern to even attempt to compete with us.

Think of a store with more than a half million customers. Does it not prove that we offer in styles and prices some things that others don't offer? Please learn, for your own sake, what this great concern means to you. See what we offer—see our liberal terms. Send today for one of these books.

FOUR FREE CATALOGS

Our General Catalog gives pictures, prices and descriptions of everything for the home—of 3,000 things like these:

Furniture, Chinaware, Sewing Machines, Carpets, Rugs, Silverware, Washing Machines, Draperies, Lamps, Clocks, Baby Cabs etc.

Our Stove Catalog shows 70 styles of Empire stoves and ranges, costing from 89c. up. Any one of these stoves will pay for itself in fuel saving before you finish paying us.

Our Piano Catalog shows the very finest grades of pianos, as low as $175.00. We accept no money down, but simply send the piano and let it sell itself. This book will save you at least $100 on any piano you want.

Columbia Graphophones are shown in a separate catalog—all styles and all records. We will send you a machine with 12 records on 30 days' free trial.

I Am the Paint Man

Write Me For My New Paint BOOK —I also send Color Cards to Select From FREE

Two Full Gallons Free to Try You Pay No Freight to Try My Paint

I HAVE a new way of manufacturing and selling house paint that's unique—that's better. Before my plan, Paint was sold in two ways—either ready-made—or mixed by a local painter.

Both these ways are at fault.

Ready-made Paint settles hard in cans—and mineral pigments and chemical acting driers in ready-made paint eat the life out of Linseed Oil—which is the LIFE of all paint. Painter-Made Paint can never be properly made by a painter—because of lack of heavy mixing and grinding machinery. My Paint is ready to use—but not ready-made. My Paint is made to order—after the order is received—packed in hermetically sealed cans—(extra size to insure a full gallon) and dated the day the Paint is made.

Pure Linseed Oil and pure, fresh paint ingredients are used in my Paint. Such materials found at local stores, are usually adulterated.

I sell my Paint direct from factory to user—at very low factory prices.

I pay freight on six-gallon orders or over.

When the order of six gallons or over is received, use two full gallons to test it—and if you are not perfectly satisfied, in every particular, return the balance of the order to me—and the two gallons you have used shan't cost you a penny.

No other paintmaker offers such a liberal proposition. I make three brands of Paint to suit the requirements of my immense trade.

My strictly Pure All White Lead Paint is absolutely the best paint in the world. My 40-60 Brand Zinc and Lead Paint is the best paint in its class on the market. My Durability Paint has an immense sale everywhere, and is sold under five-year Iron-clad guarantee. The Purity of my Paint is guaranteed under a forfeit of $100.00 in gold. Send for my beautiful Paint Book and Big Color Cards to select from—best Book—largest Cards ever published. They are FREE. With the Paint Book I send Free Book of all kinds of Painters' Supplies, sold at Direct-to-You Prices. Write TODAY. My plan insures satisfaction and lowest prices.

She Wants to Be—"Somebody"

A FEW months ago a lame, young colored girl came to the Mayesville Institute, at Mayesville, S. C., without shoes and with no clothing save what she wore. Her condition was a pitiable one. She said her pastor had told her about the Mayesville school.

"I want to come so bad, and I jes' pray to the Lord that you would let me come to your school, so I can get a education," she said to Miss Emma Wilson, the founder and principal.

"I ain't got no mother and no father, but live with my aunty," she explained.

"How do you make your living?" she was asked.

"I work in the field when it don't be rainy, so my crutch won't stick in the mud."

Jennie S—

"Where did you get the money to pay your way here?"

"Oh, our preacher take a collection in the church for me, and got three dollars, and the next day our preacher came for me and we got on the train and come to Mayesville to your school."

When she learned that she could not stay without money to pay her board, buy books, shoes and clothes, she began to cry and begged us not to send her away. Being unwilling to turn her away, Miss Wilson told her to stay, and she would see what could be done. She is a smart, bright girl, and although she can not walk without her crutch she is eager to do all she can to help herself. She chose dressmaking as her trade, and is doing very well.

"Oh," she said, "Miss Wilson, I gwine to do all I kin to make myself somebody."

Will some reader of your journal help this girl in her struggle to be somebody? Her pastor, Rev. F. E. McDonald, of Lake City, S. C., vouches for her as a girl of fine Christian character and one who, if she gets the chance, will yet give a good account of herself. Miss Wilson has already found her honest, dutiful and trustworthy, and one upon whom any assistance would be most worthily bestowed. She is sixteen, but looks older, and she has had a hard struggle for existence.

"Ef God spare me life to git a education," she says, "I will do all I kin to help de oder people 'round my home dat don't know nothin'. De Lord sent me to your school, an' I gwine to do all I kin to make myse'f somebody."

Any contributions to help train this young girl at the Mayesville school may be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and will be duly acknowledged in its columns.

RESCUED FROM MESSINA'S RUINS

A BRIGHT little Italian boy, six years old, named Giovanni Fiore, arrived on the steamship Calabria on February 2, 1909. He was accompanied by his uncle, Battista Monaco, an American citizen. Little Giovanni was taken from the ruins of Messina by his uncle two days after the earthquake. He lost father, mother, brother and sister in the disaster. The uncle, who had arrived from the United States three days before, made a search for the family in the ruins of the four-story house. This boy, who was in the ruins for two days without food or water, was protected by a fallen beam. His only injury was a scar back of the left ear. The uncle at once brought him to the United States to live with himself, his wife and six children, at No. 153 Lloyd Street, New Haven, Conn. He intends to bring Giovanni up as his own child, he being a brother of the boy's mother, who perished in the earthquake.

Giovanni Fiore, of Messina

The photograph of Giovanni, and the facts of his sad case, were obtained by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD when the matter came up before U. S. Immigration Commissioner Watchorn lately. Giovanni is one of several children who were wonderfully and indeed it would almost seem miraculously preserved during the great earthquake. In one ruined house, the father and mother perished, but two little children were rescued some nine days after the disaster, alive and unhurt. One poor little baby was taken out of the ruins, alive and smiling, though clasped in the arms of its dead mother. Correspondents in Messina and Reggio tell of many such cases.

Little Giovanni will now make this country his home. In a new land, amid pleasant surroundings and with kind friends, he may learn to forget those days of terror which deprived him of most of his kindred. In the years to come he may revisit the land of his birth.

CALLED HIGHER

Miss S. E. Adams, of Marquette, Mich., died January 27. She was a constant reader of this paper. Her last gift was to the fund for the Italian earthquake sufferers.

Mrs. Kate Brandon, of Scottsboro, Ala., died November 6, 1908, aged eighty years. She was a true Christian in the full sense of the word, and for many years a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. Christie J. Magner, aged eighty-one years, died in Tacoma, Wash., on March 22, 1908. She was a faithful Christian and a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The example of love and kindness which remains will never be forgotten by those who knew her.

At her home in Woodstock, Ill., January 13, 1909, Mrs. Angelina R. Lockwood passed from earth, in her seventieth year. She was one of the many who enjoyed THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and thought it of inestimable worth. Mrs. Lockwood was confined to her bed or her chair with rheumatism for more than eight years, but all through her long confinement and intense suffering she never once lost faith in the teachings of her Saviour.

Let the Crops Pay for Your Home in Sunny Southern Alberta

On Our New Guaranteed Crop-Payment Plan

YOU'LL be interested to investigate this splendid new opportunity if you just write for one or more of these books and the facts about our new Crop-Payment Partnership Plan on which you can obtain a splendid home in Sunny Southern Alberta. Become an "Alberta Home-Maker" like this man from the States who writes us November 7th from Pendleton, Oregon—"After an honest and searching investigation of conditions in Alberta, I know that you have the best land proposition on the American Continent—I have been in Oklahoma, Northern Texas and Eastern Oregon and I believe I have laid the foundation for an independent fortune for my family in this section of land (in Alberta)." That's what you can do. That's what thousands of others are doing—

In the Famous Bow River Valley Reservation

You, or any man who secures a home here in this favored locality now will, like the pioneer farmers in the States, become absolutely independent in a few years. On this new Partnership Plan of ours—in order to do everything possible to encourage the better class of settlers to come here and make homes we maintain pure bred male stock which is at the service of farmers on these lands—Free of charge. If you can't come at once we will start operations on your farm under contract to break, cultivate and seed such parts of your lands as you wish and start the crops so that by the time you wish to come here your crop will be ready to be harvested so that you will get the profits.

Prices Per Acre Now Are the Lowest—Get Your Profit

Sunny Southern Alberta harvested the largest crops on the Continent this year. Climate ideal for homes—Splendid transportation facilities—Good Roads—Quick cash markets—Good Schools, Churches and Neighbors, and permanent water supply, making good crops a certainty. On our new plan you practically become a partner of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. We've got to stand by you under our agreement and that's what we want to do. Pay out of your crops for your land—"No crops—No pay"—and more easily and quickly own clear title to a farm which will earn you more money for life than in any place else on this Continent and make you independent.

Which of These 5 Free Books Telling About Our Home-Making Plan in Sunny Southern Alberta, Do You Want?

With the books you select we will send you full information, low prices, description of the land and all the facts about our guaranteed crop-payment plan, and show you how you will practically be a partner of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in building up your own fortune in this country.

No. 1—"FACTS"—This book is an encyclopedia of information on mixed farming, including live stock, dairying, etc., in Sunny Southern Alberta. It also includes complete details about our crop-payment plan.

No. 2—"STAFF OF LIFE"—This is the story of the wonderful winter wheat production in Sunny Southern Alberta, which you will find most interesting and profitable to read.

No. 3—"PUBLIC OPINION"—This book includes letters from present home-owners and home-makers in the Bow River Valley in Sunny Southern Alberta. You will find it most interesting and profitable reading. It contains facts which every man ought to consider both before and after he makes up his mind to take advantage of these opportunities.

No. 4—"STARTING A FARM"—This book shows the advantages that a farm in the Bow River Valley in Sunny Southern Alberta offers to the city man, as a place to raise his family and to make an independent fortune. It contains the facts regarding the actual cost of starting a farm and gives you a very accurate idea of just how you can proceed at once, or in the near future, to get one of these farms for your own.

No. 5—"ANIMAL HUSBANDRY"—This book tells the story of the unequaled facilities presented in Southern Alberta for the development of the ideal diversified farm. Here live-stock feeding and dairy production on the rich alfalfa meadows is shown to lead to certain success.

THE UNITED STATES BATTLESHIP FLEET, entering Hampton Roads, completes its journey of 42,000 miles around the world. This wonderful journey, marks an epoch in the history of the American Navy. All naval history is replete with interest and deeds of heroism. Themistocles at Salamis, with three hundred Greek ships, smashed the Persian fleet of a thousand sail in defence of the first republic. Nelson at Trafalgar, displaying from his pennon the famous motto, "England expects every man to do his duty," established England's naval supremacy. Perry on Lake Erie, sending his laconic dispatch, "We have met the enemy and they are ours," maintained the independence of America. And Admiral Dewey at Manila Bay, giving his famous command, "You may fire when you are ready, Gridley," won freedom for the Cuban republic. The complete history of all armies and navies, empires and kingdoms, principalities and powers, from the dawn of civilization to the present day, is accurately and entertainingly told in the world-famed publication, for Dr. Ridpath's great reputation as an historian is the wonderfully beautiful style in which his History is written. He pictures the great historical events as though they were happening before your eyes; he carries you with him to see the battles of old; to meet kings and queens and warriors; to march against Saladin and his dark-skinned followers; to sail the southern seas with Drake; to circumnavigate the globe with Magellan; to know Napoleon as you know Roosevelt; and about the heroes of history he weaves the rise and fall of empires in such a fascinating style that history becomes absorbingly interesting. In concluding the History of the United States Ridpath says:

The Reason

"The Republic has passed through stormy times but has at last entered her second century of Nationality in safety and peace. The clouds that were recently so black above her have sunk behind the horizon. The Union of the States has been consecrated anew by the blood of patriots and the tears of the lowly. The temple of Freedom reared by the fathers still stands in undiminished glory. The past has taught its lesson, the present has its duty, and the future its hope."

Would you not enjoy reading the four thousand pages of the world's history of which the above paragraph is a sample? Ridpath's History has been purchased and strongly endorsed by William McKinley, President of the United States; Gen. Stephen D. Lee, Commander Confederate Veterans; General Lew Wallace, Commander and noted author; Henry M. Teller, Senator from Colorado; Charles Curtis, Senator from Kansas; and by the Presidents of all American Colleges and Universities. To read this History is to increase your store of knowledge, which is power, and add to the richness of your life.

Fathers!

Qualify your boys and girls for the great battle of life. To read Ridpath's History is to know peoples and races, kingdoms and empires, principalities and powers; to behold senates in session, armies marching, battles fought and victorious legions coming home; to follow the march of civilization westward from the Indus to the Euphrates, from the Euphrates to the Tiber, from the Tiber to the Thames, from the Thames to the Hudson, from the Hudson to the Mississippi, and from the Mississippi to the shores of the Philippines. And the greatest fact which the history of all the ages has proven for men and nations is that righteousness is the only principle that exalteth a nation, and that the only real power is intelligence united with purity of character. It is admitted the best foundation of an education is to acquire the habit of reading good books. Next to the Bible, Ridpath's History of the World is the most valuable work you can place in your home. It will acquaint your children with the great facts of history and give them the habit of reading that which is true and ennobling instead of dime novels and trashy literatnre. WOMAN'S NEW ERA IN THE FAR EAST

By EVELYN CLARK MORGAN

CHINESE women are at last awakening to the advantages of education. Traveling from Canton to Macao, I had an interesting conversation with a young Chinese wife and mother, who was enthusiastic upon the subject of female education and the enlightenment of Chinese women.

"I know so little," she lamented, almost pathetically; "but I am willing to devote myself, body and mind, to the women of China, for their ignorance is indeed deplorable. My husband is the founder and physician of a hospital at Canton, and I have my little children to care for; but some are girls, and that makes me all the more anxious to help raise the standard of education for women. Of course, there are some of my sex—and the number is increasing—who feel an interest in their own advancement; but there are others who don't care much. They are so used to being shut off from all outside life that it seems to them right to continue so."

"What have been the results, so far, of the new era?" I asked.

"Well, the anti-footbinding movement is one thing; then education of women, more independence of thought and speech, and lastly, a strong disposition to break down some of the barriers that separate the classes. The people are objecting to the kow-tow, and an effort has recently been made to do away with it. This would have been carried, but some member of the nobility protested against it. I should like to visit other lands," she continued, "to study conditions and bring home new and advanced ideas from progressive countries to my poor benighted sisters."

Another lady, in whose society I have found much pleasure, is Mrs. Ah Hok. She is the pioneer in China of woman's cause. She was the second Chinese woman to go to England; the first was the wife of an Ambassador. She went to persuade English women to come to China to help her countrywomen. It is eighteen years since this brave and talented lady took the first step toward the relief of her Chinese sisters.

Mrs. Ah Hok's husband was a wealthy merchant and philanthropist. He was interested in education, and gave $10,000 (Mexican) to the Anglo-Chinese College, at Foochow, where he resided, and where Mrs. Ah Hok still lives. He never failed to close his shop on Sunday. He was the means of saving the lives of hundreds of baby girls by providing rice for them, when their parents would have drowned them or sold them for slaves. Those parents, poor and miserable, say: "We cannot afford girls. They soon leave us (at about seven or eight years old) to work for their future mothers-in-law; so why should we have the expense of feeding them?"

Mrs. Ah Hok's home is a charming one, as Chinese homes go. Its doors and ventilation screens are richly carved. When I visited her I was ushered into a small reception room, the most conspicuous objects in which were a small ebony table and two elaborately carved ebony chairs. They stood on a slight elevation, the table between the chairs, and all placed close against the wall. I seated myself in the chair nearest the door and when Mrs. Ah Hok entered she at once took my hand and led me to the one farthest from the door. Inadvertently, I had done the proper thing, and madam had politely insisted upon my "going up higher," which meant taking the seat farthest from the door. When tea was served, I noticed that my hostess did not remove the cover of her cup, but raising the cover slightly sipped from the cup. I knew this must be the correct thing, as madam is authority on etiquette.

A High-Class School at Foochow, All Daughters of Heathen Families

"Until Christian schools were introduced in China," said Mrs. Ah Hok, "there were no schools for girls; they received no education whatever. Now, there are Chinese day and boarding schools. Many of the heathen girls, however, attend Christian schools. This is a distinct advance, too, as at first it was almost impossible to get pupils."

"Heathen families were afraid to trust their children to Christians?" I suggested.

"Yes," replied madam. "One father made me responsible that they should not put out his daughter's eyes before he would allow her to cross the threshold of the school."

I afterward learned in a visit to Miss Lee's school, one of the largest in Foochow for high-class girls, that Mrs. Ah Hok's influence in enlightening the parents to the advantages of education was very great. When Miss Lee's school was first started they paid pupils to come; but after six years she had one hundred girls, all from heathen families, and paying $1.50 (Mexican) a month.

"Do the mandarins' daughters mingle freely with the other girls?" I asked Mrs. Ah Hok.

"Oh, yes; the only people who are clannish are the field people. They are practically the farmer classes."

"Do the high-class girls still bind their feet?" I inquired.

"Oh, there has been a great change in that respect. It was hard to bring this reform about among the upper classes. It was their badge of aristocracy, and they clung to it; but now they see how hampered they are by the custom, and so they are not binding the feet of the young children and are unbinding those of the older girls. Parents are beginning to take some pride in the education of their daughters. I think this is really not because they are so anxious to have them acquire knowledge as it is the dislike to have them appear to know less than their neighbors' daughters who are being educated," and Mrs. Ah Hok laughed as she spoke of this very human trait in her country-people.

"Tell me," I urged, "something about the education of a Chinese girl of to-day."

"The parents now feel sufficient interest to come to the school to arrange. They generally like to make a pretty good bargain financially. This is not to be wondered at, for some of the most aristocratic have but little money for so extravagant

The Desire of All Nations

TEXT—Haggai 2 : 7
"The Desire of all Nations shall come"

THE feast of the Epiphany, or the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles, has been celebrated from the earliest Christian ages.

As in the fourth week after the birth of Jesus there occurred the presentation in the temple, the visit of the wise men could not well have been made till the 6th of January of the second year, and with this would agree the testimony of the Star of Bethlehem, as first suggested by the astronomer Kepler in 1603, which, though once fiercely assailed, is by the attractiveness of its surpassing fitness more and more engaging the attention of Christian chronologists.

But first year or second year, January 6 or any other date, the fact remains, as attested by St. Matthew, that when Jesus was born King of the Jews, behold, there came from the East wise men to Jerusalem and to Bethlehem, and in the house they saw the child and his mother, and worshiped him. This was the Epiphany or the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles. "He came to his own (the Jews), and his own received him not." The Gentiles came to him, and left their treasures at his feet.

In those worshiping Magi we see the pioneers of the converted Gentile world, and not only the manifestation of Christ to them, but in their visit the fulfilment of the prophecy of Haggai, that "the Desire of all Nations shall come."

The Universal Expectation

Jesus was not only the desire of the chosen people, but of the heathen as well. The broken lights of heathendom but show forth the unfading brightness that was to come. For a universal religion there was needed a universal light. The prophecies that Haggai made respecting great convulsions at hand, all nations being shaken and the Desire of all Nations to come, were fulfilled in the Lord Jesus Christ. Under Darius, the Persian empire culminated. Under Xerxes it was shaken and never recovered its power. Greece was raised up under Alexander, and was divided into the Egyptian and Syrian empires, and both fell a prey to Rome. And in the plenitude of the Roman power the Desire of the Nations came.

Other alleged incarnations have been urged as objections to the divinity of Jesus Christ, and infidels lay great store by the book Sixteen Crucified Saviours. The answer is that the shadows prove the substance, the counterfeits the reality. The question is not whether Christianity is similar to other religions, but whether Christianity is historical. I shall show to-day that heathen symbols and philosophies as well as Hebrew prophecies all point to Jesus Christ as the Desire of the Nations.

The miraculous conception and the virgin birth of our Saviour have, especially since the days of Thomas Paine, been the objects of skeptical attack and, more lamentably, are to-day a fighting ground for doubters professedly Christian. But Christendom still repeats its Credo, and all religions anticipate and mirror forth the virgin birth of the world's Saviour.

Osiris, the great founder of the Egyptian religion, is represented as visiting the earth, suffering, dying, and rising again, to be the judge of the quick and the dead. Zoroaster, the Persian and Magian, was said to have been born of a virgin, was possessed of superhuman powers, and ranked next to God, above all the angels and archangels.

In America, from the Arctic circle to the Gulf of Mexico, the Indians worshiped a hero-god called Bosho or Bozho, whose grandmother, Nokomis, descended from the moon. Her daughter, in the bloom of her virgin maidenhood, gave birth to Bosho.

The Legions of Buddha

Buddha is said to have been born, of his own free will, of a virgin, six or seven centuries before Christ, to reveal truth and deliver man from evil. He has four hundred millions of worshipers among the Eastern races. They believe, not in one incarnation, but in ten. The details, however, abound in the merest puerility and are rather elevations of humanity than incarnations of Deity. In them Vishnu appears as a human being, a boar, a tortoise, a man lion, a dwarf and as Krishna, in a human form, trampling on the head of a serpent, who bites the victor's heel. Then comes Buddha to abolish sanguinary sacrifices, and he shall come again to destroy the universe.

No one can read of these incarnations without seeing how, from Egypt to India, the Christian faith was mirrored in their mythology. But because the heathen held similar ideas with us are we, therefore, to discard our Christ and his Christianity? No! A thousand times no! But rather should we recognize them as pointing forward to the true Light of the World.

> These are but broken lights of thee,
> And thou, O Lord, art more than they!

At least these incarnations have found lodgment in the hearts and minds of humanity, and are thus expressed in their creeds. If we ask the reason, the answer is that a pure, formless, spiritual essence can never give comfort to the sorrowing soul. The thought of God as pure Spirit is too vague and abstract for our mental apprehension. We need a God who can touch us in every part of our nature, who can sympathize with our sorrows and satisfy our needs, who comes close to us as a living example, who manifests himself as our Brother and is at the same time the representative and incarnation of the invisible Father. Such a God is Jesus Christ, and such a God was the mythological desire of those nations who thus, in the twilight of their day, looked upward

> And stretched lame hands of faith to grope,
> And gather dust and chaff, and call
> To Him who is the Lord of all,
> And faintly trust their larger hope.

Their Saviour, like ours, was to be born of a virgin. Why? Because they felt that evil was like a mighty torrent, rushing down from generation to generation; that all were conceived in sin and shapen in iniquity; that every new age but reproduced the evils of the one preceding and that the race, instead of improving with development, grew rather worse than better.

How were they to break off this terrible entail, and start afresh in a better life? The birth of One inheriting no depravity—a new beginning with a new being. These pagans felt the oppression and degradation of hereditary nature. They longed for some break in this tyrannical tradition of flesh and blood. They wanted some being "who should belong to them and yet be so exceptional as to inaugurate a new era in the history of humanity. They wanted sinlessness, a sinless example and a sinless sacrifice." Now, what they figured forth in fable and fancy, God gave to them in Jesus Christ.

The World Bound Up with Christ

We say to them, as Paul did to the Athenians, "Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you." If you ask how we know that ours, and not theirs, is the true, universal religion, we answer: First, because ours is historical, while theirs is largely myth and fable. We answer secondly, because of our results. The tree is known by its fruits. As Lord Salisbury said of the living and dying nations, so we say of the living religion. Our religion produces results; theirs produce none. As Wendell Phillips also said: "The answer to Confucianism is China; to Buddha, Tibet; to Brahma, India; to Christianity, Christendom. They are all large, but have no future. Not one of the progressive races is ranged on the side of any pagan religion, and the attempts made to introduce paganism into Christian countries is a gigantic failure. The future of the world is bound up with Christianity. The Desire of the Nations in their philosophy, the highest thought of their highest thinkers, points forward to Jesus of Nazareth. The Persian prophet said, "There shall come a righteous King, whose reign shall be universal. At his advent, poison and poisonous weeds and ravenous beasts shall be expelled from the earth. He shall make streams in the desert, and there shall be no more a hot simoon. The King shall cast out forever poverty and sickness, old age and death." Why, in this heathen utterance we seem to hear the echo of Isaiah 35 and St. John's Apocalypse!

But more remarkable than the words of the Persian philosopher are the words of Plato, which read almost like a Scriptural prophecy. Speaking of "the perfectly righteous man," he says: "He must needs not be guilty of one unrighteous act and yet labor all his life long under the imputation of being utterly unrighteous. In order that his disinterestedness may be thoroughly tested, by proceeding in such a course he must arrive inevitably at bonds and the scourge, and lastly at the cross itself." Again: "Before the visible universe was made there must have existed the invisible idea, or archetype, in the mind of God. For everything from a flower to a nation there must be a preexistent idea, eternal in the heavens. And if there be an archetypal idea of the man he, too, must be manifested for a while in a human body." This was from Plato, the Gentile. St. John, the Hebrew, said, "The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us, and we beheld His glory, the glory of the Only Begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." So we find the greatest heathen philosopher here voicing the dumb desires of the whole heathen world, and pointing them to the very one they needed—the one who was born in Bethlehem, lived in Palestine, died on Calvary, was raised in the garden, and ascended to heaven from Olivet—our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

The Hope of the Ancients

The poet Virgil, in his Fourth Eclogue, says: "A virgin is coming . . . and the earlier ages are to return." He speaks of a babe, soon to be born, under whose guidance, if any vestiges of human wickedness, they shall at least cease to cause error to the world. The coming child shall found a golden race and overthrow the age of iron. He shall take on himself a divine nature, and under his mild government men shall recover their ancestral virtues. In all their mythologies the heathen mirrored forth the God they needed. They wanted a universal healer, and Esculapius was their great physician. They claim that he cured all the sick, recalled the dead to life, and Zeus, fearing that men would escape death altogether, destroyed him by a thunderbolt and then, at the request of Apollo, placed him among the stars. Jesus Christ is the true Esculapius, the world's Healer, the Great Physician. Every type of human infirmity was brought to him. He spake and the diseases fled. All physicians experiment, and sometimes fail. He never experimented and never failed. They cure through the medium of second causes. He cured by a word or the simple volition of his will. He spake or applied the healing finger and the lepers were cleansed, the blind saw clearly, the deaf heard his lightest whisper, the dumb praised him with ecstatic joy, the lame leaped as harts to do his bidding, and the dead were raised to life again and became forerunners of a general resurrection. Let but his commandments be universally obeyed and men shall live forever and no Zeus shall interfere to send them to the realms of death.

Foreshadowings of the Gospel

"Men wanted a musician to discourse sweet music and heavenly harmony; so they worshiped Orpheus. They said that by his lyre he enchanted with sweet music, not only the wild beasts of the forest, but the trees and rocks around Olympus, so that they moved from their places and followed the sound of his golden harp. They say that even in Hades that same lyre suspended the torments of the damned and won back the lost Eurydice, his wife, from the most inexorable of the deities. At the sound of his harp rivers ceased to flow, savage beasts forgot their wildness, and mountains stooped to listen to his song." Jesus Christ is the true Orpheus. At his word the rivers of iniquity do stay their currents, savage passions are subdued and mountains of ignorance and superstition melt away. He discourses such sweet music that the discordant passions of the world are hushed and all nature is by him attuned to harmony. He rescues from Hades and Gehenna without a failure all poor souls who put their trust in him.

Hercules is the great hero-god of the Greeks. They say that in his cradle he strangled two serpents sent to slay him, and that in later life he destroyed the dreaded hydra, or many-headed serpent, slew the Nemean lion, cleansed the Augean stables by turning therein two rivers, Alpheus and Pineus. He fought and conquered every foe of

PROMINENT PEOPLE TALKED ABOUT

"THE Children's Poet" and author of not less than 1,200 hymns and songs, which have been translated into almost every modern tongue, Albert Midlane, died at Newport, Isle of Wight, February 28, from an apoplectic stroke. He was born in Newport in 1825. He began to write hymns and little poems at the age of seventeen. His last poem was written a few days before his death. He is immortalized by his beautiful hymn, "There's a Friend for Little Children," which has been sung all over the British Isles in thousands of Sunday Schools and churches. It was written for a Newport Sunday School anniversary, without the slightest idea on his part that it would make his name famous. Many of his hymns have a place in the hymnals of the Christian denominations. One is a popular favorite throughout the world, "Revive Thy Work, O Lord."

Mr. Midlane was in business till he was over seventy. He was an excellent preacher, identified with the Plymouth Brethren, and ministered regularly in a little church in Newport and to scattered congregations. Mrs. Midlane survives him. On March 20, 1901, the couple celebrated their golden wedding. They have three children and three grandchildren.

One of Mr. Midlane's most pathetic productions is a poem on Princess Elizabeth, who was imprisoned in Carisbrooke Castle, where, at the age of seventeen, she was one morning found dead, with her head on her Bible, the volume being opened at the chapter in Matthew containing the words, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." WILLIAM DURBAN.

London, England.

A week or two ago there appeared on the editorial page of this paper a reference to the new philanthropy inaugurated by Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, Sr., of New York City, to build apartment houses for the exclusive use of families which had among their members some suffering from tuberculosis.

The plans for the structures, which will probably serve as models for other structures of a similar kind throughout the country, are now completed and active building operations will soon be started. Mrs. Vanderbilt has made the subject a matter of study for a number of years and enlisted as her helpers some of the most experienced physicians and architects in New York City. The buildings will have no hospital air about them, but on the contrary will be far more artistic than the usual New York apartment houses.

Hon. James Norris Gillett, Governor of California, is now as well known to the Eastern part of the United States, on account of his recent endeavors to bring about a satisfactory solution of the Japanese question, as he is in his own State. Governor Gillett and President Roosevelt made such a determined fight against the anti-Japanese bills, which if made part of the laws of California would have led to international complications, that the Assembly of California voted to reconsider its former vote to segregate the Japanese students in the public schools by a vote of 41 to 37.

Governor Gillett said that if the bills were passed it would have a bad effect on the minds of people in other States, who were greatly interested in the outcome, and would ultimately defeat a general Asiatic exclusion law if such, as the result of an influx of people from across the Pacific, should become necessary. The Japanese government is pledged to divert emigration to other countries, especially to Korea and Manchuria.

Governor Gillett is not a "Native Son of the Golden West," though he has made his home there for many years past. He was born in Wisconsin in 1860, and educated there. He moved to California, and was admitted to the practice of law in 1881. He took an active interest in State politics and became a State Senator in 1897. From 1903 to 1907 he represented the First Congressional District of California in Washington.

The great South American Republic of Brazil is doing all possible to cultivate friendly relations with this country, and her best diplomats are therefore always chosen to represent her at Washington. She alone of all the South American countries has an ambassador to the United States, the other countries south of the isthmus being represented by ministers plenipotentiary. Senhor Joaquin Nabuco, who was appointed a short time ago, has created a most pleasant impression in this country and his speeches on public occasions have attracted widespread interest.

the human race. He is said to have gone to the garden of the Hesperides, to fetch the golden apples which had been lost for ages; and he descended into the nether world and carried away Cerberus, the porter of hell-gate. He consummated his career by being himself carried in a chariot and horses into heaven.

Jesus Christ is the true Hercules. He strangles the old serpent, the devil, and destroys the hydra-headed monster, sin. He fought and conquered, not the Nemean lion of fiction, but the roaring lion, the devil. He cleanses the Augean stables of human society by pouring therein the divine streams of heavenly grace and the current of his pure morality. He restores to us the golden fruit of purity and divine communion, lost by our parents in Eden. And, as we say in our creed, "He descended into Hades," and led the monster Death in chains. After spoiling principalities and powers, he ascended into heaven and now waits expectantly, till his foes become his footstool. The Greek Zeus, like the Roman Jupiter, was the highest and most powerful of their gods. He was the father of gods and men. He wielded the thunderbolt and directed the storm. All powers were subject to him, both in heaven and earth. Jesus Christ is the true Zeus and Jupiter. All power is given to him, both in heaven and earth. Not on Olympus, but from the heavenly hill of Zion, he rules forever and directs the storms and tempests of the world, hushing them into harmony as he whispers, "Peace, be still." Now all these gods have gone. They are gone from human society, gone from human worship, gone from human belief. But the Lord Jesus Christ lives. He was the antitype of all these types, the substance of all these shadows, and he only remains.

As Canon Liddon says, "Man cannot dispense with religion, and when he has once come in contact with the highest type of religion he has thereby exhausted the religious capacities of his nature. The absolute religion makes any religion after it impossible for free and sincere minds." So the absolute religion of Christ outlives all heathen mythologies.

So Esculapius and Hercules are forgotten save in classic story, but the Lord Jesus still carries on, in a higher and spiritual sense, their work. Vulcan no longer wields his hammer in Plutonian regions, and in the thoughts of men the Tartarean blacksmith is no more. But the hammer of Christ's Word still breaks rocky hearts in pieces and moulds them to receive the impress all divine. Venus, with a love sensual and selfish, is now known no more, but the love of God through Jesus Christ reigns and is the mainspring of the life service of millions on the earth to-day. Minerva, with her wisdom, is revered in classic story alone and her reign is at an end, but is spreading among the nations and leavening the multitudes to-day.

> The wisdom coming from above,
> The faith that sweetly works by love,

Ceres no more exercises dominion over the fields of the earth. We now gather in our harvests without any reference to the Greek goddess of agriculture, but the Man of Nazareth still breaks the bread of life to hungry men and women. Memorial sacraments of bread and wine are celebrated in his honor, and each ear of corn and grain of wheat furnishes texts to preachers who strive

> To spread through all the earth abroad
> The honors of His name.

Pan no longer exercises universal dominion over the shepherds and flocks of the earth. Years and years ago they say the world stood still and nature held her breath while on the classic Ægean Sea, and by the haunted isle of Sicily, sailors rested their oars amidst the universal hush that told great Pan was dead. But the Good Shepherd of Israel, who never slumbers nor sleeps, still keeps watch and ward over his people. He is constantly calling his sheep from world-wide flocks. They know his voice and follow him into the green pastures of his truth and by the still waters of his grace, and by and by they shall be gathered into his heavenly fold, to go out no more forever.

Gustave Doré, in his picture, "The Triumph of Christianity," represents the Christ steadily advancing, bearing the cross, while before him all the gods of the heathen are utterly overthrown. There are both truth and error in the conception. Not merely by the total overthrow of false religions does Jesus win his way, but as a cleansing, purifying influence he permeates old creeds, casts out the false and base and sanctifies the pure and true. He has fulfilled the dreams of the past, and thus has paved the way for a diviner future. All the types and shadows of Jewish economy, all heathen signs and symbols, thoughts and philosophies pointed forward to the Christ of God. They perish, he remains; they all wax old, as doth a garment, and pass away. He is ever the same and his years shall not fail.

"The Saviour of the past, he is the Saviour of the present and will be Saviour to the end of time. Accept him and he will fill your every want. Your needs shall be abundantly satisfied in him, and soon, if faithful unto death, you shall enjoy the Desire of all Nations and of your own heart forever more!"

That the Lord Jesus Christ is to-day, as of old, the Desire of all Nations was shown by a history of one day in my own experience. In the morning at the New York Preachers' Meeting the Rev. Charles Morris, a returned missionary from Korea, told the wonderful story of the craving of the Koreans for Christ. Twenty-three years ago no Christians were allowed in the Hermit Kingdom to teach any new religion, as being subversive of the customs of the fathers. To-day the Koreans are turning to the Saviour with such rapidity and in such numbers that conservative calculations consider that the conversion of the whole country in thirty years is by no means an extravagant estimate. Mr. Morris was followed by the Rev. Edward Ryerson Young, who told of the first reception of the glad tidings by the Indians in the sub-Arctic regions. After he had told the old story—absolutely new to them—of Jesus and his love and they had worked out the problem that the Fatherhood of God must imply the brotherhood of man, they inquired, "Why, missionary, if that is true, you are our brother. Why have our brothers kept this news from us so long? Come, come, come again and tell us that story, for that is just what we need."

In the evening I heard Gipsy Smith give his life's history and the remarkable record of the conversion of his father, who had never read a Bible, never sang a hymn, never had an hour's Christian instruction, but who heard of a revival in London, without knowing its meaning; went to the great city, attended one of the missions and in one hour was shouting and leaping and praising God for giving him just the thing he needed. So in one day we heard from Oriental Korea, Northwestern Canada and from the sunny glades of Britain that Jesus Christ was and is the Desire of Nations in the twentieth century, the same yesterday, to-day and forever.

A TIME OF STIRRING REVIVALS

Pastors Become Evangelists

INDEPENDENCE, Mo., a city of 12,000 people, was for four weeks in January deeply stirred by evangelistic meetings, which were conducted by the pastors of the six leading Protestant churches.

Independence is one of the oldest towns in Western Missouri, the county seat of Jackson County, and but for the fact that Kansas City is a little more favorably located would have retained its early lead as a city. As it is, it must be content to be the capital of Greater Kansas City.

At the close of the summer vacation the Ministers' Alliance began to plan for a union meeting for January, and decided that it was best for the ministers to conduct the meeting themselves. Preparatory meetings were held each week during December, including the officers and workers in the various churches. The meetings began Sunday evening, January 3, in the largest church available, with a capacity of 1,200 to 1,400. An evangelistic singer with large experience was brought from Chicago.

From the very first meeting, the attendance taxed the capacity of the church, especially at the night services. On Sunday evenings overflow meetings were necessary. Two meetings daily were held, except on Saturday; also prayer meetings for women, for men and for young people. Many of the afternoon meetings were attended by 600 to 700 people, and all business houses and offices closed for one hour in the afternoon on five different days, and on three of these days the saloons also closed, and the business men with their help attended the services. Many times in the afternoon the men outnumbered the women. The meetings were planned for two weeks, but continued four weeks.

The six pastors did the preaching. The time for each to preach was decided by lot, and the public did not know who would preach until the speaker rose to begin.

Two Presbyterians, two Methodists, Baptist and Disciples were engaged in the services. Every pastor and worker seemed to vie with one another in generosity and Christian courtesy, and there was perfect harmony all the way through. That this continues is shown by a women's prayer meeting each month and a union midweek prayer meeting bi-monthly, both of which are largely attended and enthusiastic.

The results have been very gratifying to all who were engaged in the meeting. The members of the churches became workers, many covenants were renewed, about 150 made profession of saving faith and nearly all have united with the churches. It is a fact that the churches of Independence have been brought closer together and that their members have cultivated an acquaintance that has brought love and respect for one another. It has been discovered that co-operation does not mean compromise of the truth for any one. Moreover, the world about them has come to know that the churches can unite in a common work for the extension of God's kingdom.

"Living-Like-Jesus" Movement Spreading

ON the first Sunday in March the movement recently started among 11,000 Cleveland young people to make a special two-weeks effort to live "as Christ would live" is to be extended to England, Canada and throughout the United States. A committee of thirty is in charge of this work of extension, and is known as the "International What-Would-Jesus-Do Committee."

Letters of inquiry as to the movement and its success in Cleveland have come from many parts of the United States and from Canada. These letters have also expressed the desire to inaugurate the same plan in the respective towns from which they came. Circulars have now been sent out by the committee on extending the work to the heads of church societies in scores of cities, fully describing the movement.

The international trial of asking, "What would Jesus do?" wherever a question arises as to what course one should pursue will be for two weeks, as in Cleveland. This united effort, it is hoped, will result, in many cases, in living a Christian life the year round.

W. D. Price, a Cleveland law student, is chairman of the new international committee. Miss Agnes Wallace originated the movement among the members of the Epworth League, to which she belongs. Mr. Price, who is vice-president of the City Union of Epworth Leagues, enlarged the idea to take in all Young People's Societies of the city.

Rev. Dr. Charles A. Eaton, who came to New York lately from Cleveland, O., where the movement to "live as Jesus would live" started, spoke recently on the subject in the Madison Avenue Baptist Church, New York. "Jesus," said Dr. Eaton, "wouldn't be born in Fifth Avenue. He would be born on Mott or Elizabeth Street, or some other poor section of the East Side—not from any absurd prejudice against the rich, but because of the natural law that everything must work from the bottom up. And that is one reason why an exclusive, aristocratic church is an anomaly from a Christian standpoint. Jesus would look at the East Side multitudes, and he would try to teach them. Then if he came uptown, say to Fifth Avenue and Forty-second Street, and saw that tide of wealth and culture, I think he would be moved by the very same emotions that moved him downtown. He would see too much frivolity, too much mock refinement, too much money, too many engagements. If he wanted to help a man, he wouldn't dress him smartly and give him money and invite him to go to an elevating play. He would go to these prodigals in this city, who are so shamefully wasting their money, and with compassion and sympathy would try to bring them to see the error of their ways."

The following letter from Mr. Price to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD explains itself:

Evangelist W. D. Price

"We intend to make the What Would Jesus Do movement world wide. This is a great undertaking, and we seek your co-operation in making it a success. The International What Would Jesus Do Committee has been formed to spread the movement. It will be endeavored to make the rule a permanent, life-long principle. Certificates will be given to all who take the life pledge. Hereafter the first Sunday in every year will be commemorated throughout the world as 'In His Steps' Day.

"The movement will be permanent, life pledges being taken and new members being added continually. Over two thousand Cleveland young people have already become life members."

One Thousand Decide for Christ

IT was a wave of the true old-time religion that swept over Coffeyville, Kan., in January, during the Biederwolf revival in that city. Over one thousand adults professed conversion in the course of the three weeks' meeting. On the last Sunday evening of the campaign, nearly one hundred and fifty men and women marched down the aisles to give themselves to Christ at the altar.

Stirring scenes were enacted in the large tabernacle from night to night. The building was an immense temporary structure, seating over three thousand, with comfortable plank seats and straw-covered, earthen floor. The chorus platform was occupied nightly with a choir of 250 voices, aided by a large orchestra. Invariably, at the close of the evening's sermon, numbers would come forward to the altar, while the Christian people passed about, speaking with their friends and urging them to be reconciled to God. Men of all classes and employments gathered at the altar—railroad men, glass-blowers, mail-carriers, teamsters, students, carpenters, oil and gas operators, office people and business men—many of them prominent in city and county affairs. The evangelist's sermon on "Amusements" resulted in a renewal of vows on the part of many Christians, and throughout the revival many were quickened to new life.

A children's parade was held, in which more than a thousand children marched the streets, with music and waving flags. A midnight parade of the Christian people filled the streets with spectators and listeners. On "Farmers' Day" hundreds of people from out of town drove in for the all-day services. There was railroad men's night, young people's night, business men's night, old soldiers' night, and on different occasions the various lodges of the city marched to the tabernacle in uniform and occupied special seats.

Homer Rodeheaver was Mr. Biederwolf's chorister and soloist, and the singing was one of the features of the revival. Miss Grace Leard sang the simple Gospel songs with deep feeling and effect. The Coffeyville revival, in point of recorded results, was the greatest single meeting thus far in the Kansas Forward Movement.

Boston Too, Has an Awakening

BOSTON is experiencing one of the most remarkable revivals in its history. The work of grace is under the leadership of Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and Mr. Charles M. Alexander, assisted by about sixty evangelists and Gospel singers. Competent observers are comparing it with the revival of '58, and those of Whitefield and the Wesleys. Dr. A. Z. Conrad, chairman of the committee of churches which invited the evangelists, declares that it is the greatest revival ever known in Boston. There is little emotionalism at the meetings; no hysteria nor excitement, but God's Spirit is present in such power that when the invitation is given scores and sometimes hundreds come boldly forward to publicly confess Christ.

Men of all classes and conditions are among the converts. The head of a detective agency, with sobs, talked about the way of salvation. Ministers are being called up by telephone to give comfort to anxious souls. The young men attending the Methodist Theological Seminary—the largest in the world—became so zealous in winning people to Christ, not only at the revival meetings, but also on the streets, day and night, that they at length closed the school for a week, so that they might devote their whole time to the revival. One employer took his employees, one by one, into his office and explained to them the way of salvation.

The singing of Gospel songs occupies a prominent place in the awakening. The city is ringing with revival melodies. Even on a street car recently a song service was held by an evangelist and several reporters, returning from a meeting.

The converts include all classes—comedians, saloonkeepers, bartenders, drunkards, "crooks," and business and professional men. On two occasions the workers have gone down into the slums at midnight and conducted services.

One night, at an after-meeting, after perhaps fifty men had gone forward to confess Christ as Saviour, the Spirit was present in such power that one after another hardened in sin continued to go forward and brokenly yield to God. One was a sea captain, almost eighty years of age. Another was an old, distinguished-looking man, who hobbled on a cane, and said that he had come from Toronto on business, but had been drinking heavily and was on the verge of delirium. He had been a Christian once, but fell. He declared that last night he was afraid to go to bed, but not now, for he had Jesus in his heart. Another, who accepted Christ a few evenings before, said that he had led another to his new Master, and that this had been the happiest week of his life. The revival fire is spreading rapidly to other cities and towns in New England.

VICTIMS OF TURKISH PERSECUTION

Christians and Mohammedans Alike Suffer in a Strange Turkish Rebellion

Tents Supplied by Missionaries to the Refugees

A FEW months ago, the civilized world was shocked by the news, briefly communicated by cable, of the ruthless massacre by Turkish troops of the defenseless dwellers in a number of villages of Northern Mesopotamia. The Rev. Alpheus N. Andrus of the Mardin Mission (of the American Board) wrote briefly to this journal stating the forlorn condition of the survivors, and it now appears that the contributions then forwarded by our readers through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have been the means of keeping many of these helpless refugees alive.

Missionary Andrus has now sent a second letter, which graphically tells the story of the slaughter. It is an extraordinary narrative and the events it relates, occurring at the very dawn of the new Turkish régime, must pass into history along with the dark and terrible tragedies in Armenia, which took place under Sultan Abdul Hamid's rule. Mr. Andrus writes:

Missionary Andrus in His Study

"In the spring of 1908, Abdul Hamid made a requisition upon his Hamidian cavalry for 600 men to be stationed near the Medina end of the Damascus-Mecca Railway for its protection from the Bedouins. He made the first call for this kind of service upon Ibrahim Pasha (his 'son,' as he fondly called him), who, with characteristic promptness, not only offered double the number called for, but promised to pay all the expenses of their preparation, and of the journey to Aleppo, and also to accompany the expedition himself. He kept his promise, and at Aleppo he received orders to take 600 of his troops and proceed to Damascus. He was encamped outside Damascus preparatory to entraining his troops for Medina when the sudden events after the middle of July (the national movement for a new constitution) took matters out of the hands of the Sultan, broke up the camarilla of Yildiz and put the responsibility for the movement of troops upon the new War Minister. This minister, instead of ordering Ibrahim Pasha to start at once with his cavalry for Medina, commanded him, through the Wali (Governor) at Damascus, to send his troops back to their homes, and to set out immediately to report at Constantinople.

"Ibrahim Pasha refused to recognize any Salonica Committee, and declared that he would take orders from the Sultan alone. The Wali showed him a later order, to the effect that if Ibrahim Pasha should attempt to return to Wevan Shehir, the Wali should proceed to arrest him and send him under escort to Constantinople. After a few days of delay the Wali, himself a reactionist, allowed his eyes to be blinded by yellow dust so that he could not see that Ibrahim Pasha had folded his tents like the Arabs and silently slipped away.'

"Ibrahim Pasha was two hours on his way to the Euphrates when the Turkish cavalry left Damascus to overtake him, but they never saw his dust! He made forced marches, in the hope of reaching the fords of the Euphrates before troops could be gathered to dispute his passage. But he was disappointed to find the ford held by troops which had been sent up from Deir-uz-Zor to intercept him. He, however, at once gave battle to compel the Sultan's forces to withdraw. In this, too, he failed. His next move was to keep those opposed to him busy, while he prepared to steal away in the night and by a forced march reach some upper fords and put the river behind him. This he safely accomplished, and in a few days reached one of his own villages, one and a half hours west of Wevan Shehir, without further opposition.

"He made that village the rendezvous for the tribes under him and there prepared them for the inevitable conflict. He had hoped to reach and occupy Wevan Shehir—his stronghold—before it could be reached and held by the regular soldiery; but the action of the government at Mardin was too quick for him, and he found, to his chagrin, that a small body of troops had already entered the town and established itself in the barracks. Both he and his tribe imputed this move to the Christians of the town, and they felt bitterly hostile to them for what they regarded as a treacherous surrender of the place to the government. Of course, the poor Christians had nothing whatever to do with it.

"Ibrahim Pasha's first effort was to dislodge those troops. He besieged them and cut off their water supply. In a short time their rations were exhausted and they were in a desperate condition. They were about to make a sally and break their way through the Pasha's cordon, when he himself came forward and offered them three days' rations, on condition that they would withdraw from the town, and out of sight of it. They accepted the offer and were allowed to march out. Having thus full possession of the town, Ibrahim Pasha began to fortify and strengthen his position. Meanwhile, troops were gathering against him from every side, and plunder-loving Koords, in even larger numbers, drawn by the prospect of rich booty, had accompanied the troops.

"To save bloodshed and pillage, the commandants (there were three of them) made a great effort to induce the Pasha to surrender, and had secured his consent, when an incident occurred which negatived all their efforts and brought on a battle. Troops were marching from Ayoob Payklumber (a village on the road to Sevevek), to receive the surrender of arms from the Pasha's soldiers, but a near relative of the Pasha had the impression that they were really intending to fight and capture the Pasha. Accordingly, when they came within range, he opened fire on them upon his own responsibility. At once each side felt that it was deceived by the other, and a severe struggle ensued, in which the regular troops were easily victorious. The victory, however, was not pressed home, and Ibrahim Pasha improved the respite to withdraw with his family, large supplies of money and goods, camels and sheep, and 600 of his followers, to the castle of his redoubtable henchman, Hadji Hassein Konjo, at Ihlali, about twenty-five miles southeast of Wevan Shehir. Here he remained twenty-four hours.

How the Ruined Homes Look

"At the end of that time troops from Diarbekir began to appear in a village one hour east of the castle, and they had with them some guns from a mountain battery. Some blank shots were fired from these as a summons to surrender. His henchmen advised the Pasha to surrender and not prolong the useless struggle. To this the Pasha replied, 'You are at liberty to surrender, if you wish, but I never shall.' The Pasha was at the time extremely ill from dysentery. When he reached the banks of the Euphrates, at Usfayeh, he succumbed to his illness and was hurriedly buried. Already troops from Deir-uz-Zor, Mosul, and Nisibin, as well as some of his implacable Arab foes, were seeking to surround him and his entourage.

"With Ibrahim Pasha dead, and his followers scattered to the four winds, what happened to his town, and to the villages of his followers? In the town of Wevan Shehir, the officers seemed to lose all control over their men. The latter began systematically to visit the houses of Ibrahim Pasha's relatives, and of those well-to-do Christians whom they suspected. A large supply of booty was gathered, in the distribution of which the civil officers, the military leaders, and the soldiers shared. The citizens had no redress whatever. Many houses were visited three and four times by different bands of soldiers, who each time carried off whatever appealed to their fancy. The 200 shops fared still worse; not only were most of them stripped of their goods, but even the shutters were appropriated for camp fires. The entire town was treated by the army as though equally guilty with Ibrahim Pasha in his senseless rebellion against the new order of things, whereas the town is 75 per cent. Christian.

"Outside of Wevan Shehir, in the 200 villages reckoned to the rule of Ibrahim Pasha, all the troops, and the Koords from the mountains who, like birds of prey, had scented plunder from afar, and all the enemies of Ibrahim Pasha—both Arabs and Koords—from a distance of 150 miles, threw themselves upon the defenseless villages with cyclonic fury and, driving off the inhabitants, seized all that they could appropriate—camels, horses, donkeys, sheep, goats, cattle, cows, tents, household goods, clothing, farming implements, threshing floors full of grain, and storehouses of grain buried in the earth, and stacks of straw. Where the villagers dwelt in tents, nothing was left to show where the villages had been. Where the village was one of adobe houses, the rapacious hordes were not satisfied with cleaning out everything, but burnt the houses to complete their ravages.

"'The Kusv' is the castle of Hadji Hassein Konjo, which he built not only for residence, but also as a protection from the raids of the Arabs, and a rallying point for the tribes of the Demadeeyah Gezidees. It was here he brought Ibrahim Pasha when he fled from Wevan Shehir. After Ibrahim Pasha left the castle to flee, Hadji Hassein Konjo answered the summons to surrender by going out to meet the commander of the troops and made his surrender in person, stipulating that his tribes, who had taken no part in the rebellion, should be unmolested after delivering up their arms. This was promised him, and he escorted the commandant to his castle, which he turned over to him, and with it 800 stand of arms and a supply of ammunition. Once in

Remarkable Revivals

THERE are many extraordinary features in connection with the present phenomenally active revival season which might profitably be studied by those critics who have recently declared that "the day of the revivalist is over." The remarkable feature of the great awakening, in Boston, was the united forces of 160 Protestant churches, comprising Baptist, Congregational, Methodist, Presbyterian and Episcopal, which were associated for the one purpose of promoting the "King's business." These 160 churches were divided into twenty-eight groups of about six churches in each, and when the evangelistic campaign, with Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander at the head, commenced work in the central group, in every other group twenty-seven other evangelists with their evangelistic singers commenced simultaneously, so that there were running nearly thirty meetings every day and every evening. These groups extended out into the suburbs all around Boston. Denominational lines were obliterated and the forces of the church were consolidated in each of these various centres. The result was that on the largest days the audience at evangelistic meetings ran to the height of 61,000 attendants in a day!

Another feature of the Boston movement was that prior to the coming of the evangelists there had been a great spirit of prayerfulness and expectancy in all the churches, and the meetings had not been in operation two days before the showers of blessing fell upon the people.

The interest on the part of the press and the public was astonishing. Every paper of the city opened its columns to the fullest reports. Some papers came out with three solid pages of matter reported from the meeting. Meetings were crowded hours before the time in many instances and thousands were turned away. It is estimated that the gross attendance at all the meetings exceeded 650,000 and there were thousands of converts, from the highest walks in life to the lowest, in every place all over the city. After the evangelists withdrew, meetings were continued by the local pastors, with constant accessions of converts. It was acknowledged that the whole civic and social life of the city had been wonderfully uplifted.

In parallel lines with the great Boston awakening, though on a lesser scale, are the almost simultaneous revivals in Kansas, Ohio and Missouri, the first under Dr. Biederwolf and a corps of spiritual helpers, the second under Evangelist Price, leader of the "Living-Like-Jesus" movement, and the last under six local pastors of Independence, Mo. All these revivals have been especially notable in their results, hundreds, and in some instances thousands, being led to accept Christ as Saviour, and to begin a new and better life on Christian lines. It is doubtful whether, even in the palmiest days of the old-time revivals, there ever was such an extensive spiritual outpouring recorded in a short period of two months as that we have just witnessed.

Mr. Roosevelt's Hunt

SEVERAL readers of this journal, who are interested in Mr. Roosevelt's projected hunting trip in Africa, have written us inquiring whether hunters are permitted to slaughter big game indiscriminately in that country. In those parts of Africa, within the spheres of influence of the civilized nations at least, a license is necessary. This license grants, usually, permission to the hunter to kill no more than two elephants, two rhinoceroses, two hippopotami, and a limited number of antelopes, but leaves him free to deal with as many lions, leopards and other animals of the man-eating class as may fall to his gun. In special cases, a license is issued granting the right to kill game of all kinds without limit; but Mr. Roosevelt declined such a license, and accepted one with the usual limitations. He goes to Africa not for love of slaughter, but as a sportsman and scientific investigator. He will take no reporters in his party, and won't have any friendships in the jungle. Any reckless press man who tries to "tag" him will have to take care of himself when Mr. Roosevelt is shooting lions.

Bulletins from the big game country—the Great Nandi plateau, many miles inland from Mombasa—and from points west and north, are of a character to stir the hunting blood and make the pulses gallop. In one section some thirty-two lions and a detachment of elephants and giraffes have been sighted. When Mr. Roosevelt and his party "trek" from the coast to the hunting ground there will be "spoor" of big game in abundance. The white chief's "safari," or hunting kit, will be in requisition, and we may look forward to some exciting letters from the field before midsummer.

A Sensible Suggestion

PEOPLE have always wondered why the custom of inauguration of our Presidents on the 4th of March has been kept up when experience has proved again and again that a worse time of the year could not have been chosen and that, as a usual thing, there is a rainstorm or a light fall of snow. One of the earlier Presidents, it was arranged, should be inducted into office on the first Thursday in March. This happened to come on the 4th, and both President-elect, troops and people have risked their health in consequence for several generations since.

The time to make a change in the date is just after a President has assumed the reins of government; and, with the recent inauguration fresh in mind, Senator Depew, of New York, has introduced a resolution in the Senate providing that hereafter the Presidents of the United States be inaugurated on the last Wednesday in April instead of on March 4. The terms of future Congresses are also to continue to the new inauguration date. The resolution will be reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and it is to be hoped that favorable action will be taken at that time. As it would lengthen the present short session of Congress, many matters of importance could be finished by the Congress which had dealt with the measures in the beginning, instead of rushing them through without due consideration or leaving them to be considered by the new Congress.

One President lost his life as a result of a cold caught at the March 4 ceremonial, and at the last inaugural thousands of people stood in the wet, and the amount of illness as a result is beyond estimate. Troops formed in snow up to the knee, and were uncomfortable most of the time. In April there might be light showers, but nothing that would interfere seriously with the happiness and health of thousands on this great American day.

A Word About Chinese Orphans

AFTER the last famine in China, there were thousands of orphans, whose parents had succumbed to the ravages of starvation and disease. With the hearty co-operation of the missionaries, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has undertaken to support two thousand of these little waifs, who will be trained by Christian teachers for lives of usefulness. We have had a good many inquiries as to what preparations have been made for the care of these children. Our readers will be glad to learn that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has succeeded in making most satisfactory arrangements. We have a Missionary Committee in Chinkiang, which is superintending operations, providing orphanages and appointing those who are to take local charge. This committee began operations on January 1, 1909, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has already paid over to it, for the purposes of this orphan work, the sum of $23,000. We have now at Chinkiang, under the Rev. John Paxton, 500 orphans; at Hinghua, under Methodist missionaries, 100 orphans; at Sianfu, under undenominational missionaries, 100; at Saratsi (undenominational), 100 orphans; at Hsuchfou (Presbyterian), 150 orphans; at Shanghai (interdenominational), 100 orphans, and at Tsing-kiang-pu (Presbyterian), 20 orphans, and under Bishop Bashford's charge (Methodist), at different localities, some 400 more.

These orphans, most of them little more than babies, are to be supported by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during a period of seven years. The cost of support is $20 each per annum. They will receive educational, industrial and religious training. We believe there are many readers of this journal who will be glad to avail themselves of this opportunity to become sharers in this beautiful missionary work. If the great empire of China is ever to be won for Christ, it must be very largely accomplished through the little children. We would ask our friends who write us intending to undertake orphan support, to state in their letters their preferences as to sex and age, and also as to the denominational training they desire for their protegés. Remittances may be made quarterly. Patrons need continue support only as long as it is perfectly convenient. They can stop at any time, but we should expect to receive due notice of such discontinuance in order that we may make other arrangements.

The Labor Colony Question

BILLS providing for a State Commission on Unemployment have been introduced in the New York State Legislature, and a hearing was given lately in Albany by the Committee on Ways and Means, at which the difficult problem of dealing with the great army of idle workers was discussed According to estimates submitted to the committee, there are at present some 200,000 unemployed in New York City alone, a majority of whom have been out of work for nearly two years. This is a legacy of the industrial depression that followed the panic of 1907, the results of which were felt throughout the whole country. Of these unemployed, 80,000 are skilled workers belonging to labor unions..

For the committee's enlightenment, a number of persons engaged in sociological, philanthropic and charitable work were invited to give their views on this abnormal situation, the continuance of which is proving a burden altogether too heavy for the charity organizations of the metropolis. Among the solutions proposed is the establishment of State labor colonies for the unemployed. Such colonies are of two classes: free colonies, which unemployed workers may join or leave at will, and penal colonies, to which they are formally committed for a fixed period and where they are practically prisoners. This latter form of colony could be made serviceable only in dealing with the idle criminal classes, the worthless vagrant who will not work, the mendicant and the professional tramp. It would be an unjust, outrageous and unheard-of thing to suggest that the honest worker, who may be idle through no fault of his own, should be subjected to the stigma of a criminal commitment, and placed upon the level of the classes mentioned. Poverty and unemployment are not crimes, but conditions which may arise in any community.

We believe the time is coming when public sentiment will favor the trial of labor colonies in New York and several other States, and that they will not only prove wise, but economical and a great improvement upon the present crude methods of charity societies, "bread lines," municipal lodging-houses and poor-houses. But no attempt to introduce forced labor colonies for American workingmen, who are guilty of no offense against the law, can ever hope to succeed here. Such an attempt would not only be condemned on constitutional grounds, but the very suggestion would arouse a universal storm of protest.

Spectacular Sacred Burial

THE funeral of the Primate of Roumania was held in February according to the ceremonies of the orthodox Greek Church. The dead body was robed and placed on a throne, where thousands of his friends were permitted to kiss his hand for the last time. On Tuesday morning the beautiful cathedral was crowded with priests, preparing for the funeral service. In the middle of the church, facing the altar, the dead primate was seated in a high-backed arm-chair, dressed in the richest sacerdotal vestments; the mitre, glittering with precious stones, on his head; his crozier at his side, and on his knees the Book of the Gospels. His beautiful face, with its delicate features and pure white hair and beard, showed no traces of pain. After an ornate service of an hour, the remains of the primate, still seated in the chair, were taken to the funeral car, and placed in the midst of the plants and flowers which had been arranged thereon. Four priests stood round the chair during the progress through the principal thoroughfares of the city leading to the monastery, where the prelate had expressed a desire to be buried. The uncovered funeral car presented the appearance of a raised platform on wheels, richly draped in black and drawn by six horses, and thus the Archbishop passed, for the last time, through the crowds of silent people, surrounded by dignitaries of the church in resplendent vestments, to the sound of choirs of boys' voices, tolling bells, the prayers of priests, and the strains of a funeral march played by the military band. And just as he was, still seated in his chair, he was lowered into the tomb and passed away from mortal sight.

This spectacular funeral service suggests two important thoughts that seem to be opposed to each other. The first is earthly mortality. In a certain sense, the service was a mockery; the real man was not there, and the robes and badges of authority only emphasized the vanity of earthly inequality and the frailty of his mortality. Many of the nations of the past buried their kings in royal robes. Centuries after his burial, the tomb of one of the greatest monarchs of France was opened, and they found a gold crown, a sword and a few jewels laughing at the little piles of dust that had been so proud to wear them. Death is a great leveler, and does not care anything for crowns or jewels or vestments. The other thought suggested by the funeral of the prelate is that of man's immortality. The placing him in the chair and carrying him about in the funeral car among the flowers, in the city which he loved, in view of the people whom he had served, to his resting place was an eloquent illustration of the fact that the head of the church was not dead, but still lives. Every prayer offered, every moment of communion with his God, every poor man helped or orphan clothed or fed, every sorrow soothed, every heart changed, justified his right to be counted alive; for those are the things that never die. The funeral of every good man of low or high estate, while teaching the lesson of earthly frailty, teaches also the immortality of holiness, faith and love.

Man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets. (Eccles. 12 : 5.)

The Ant-Eater Conquers the 'Possum

An ant-eater from South America recently arrived at the Bronx Zoological Garden, in New York City. There was no cage for his reception, and he was put with the 'possums. There was one large 'possum, which was presented to the Garden a few weeks ago by a friend of the President, and named Taft. He was easily the "boss" of those in his colony. From the start he treated the ant-eater with disdain, showing by his action that he considered him as an inferior creature. The stranger bore this contempt for some time, until one day Taft undertook to crowd the ant-eater away from his dish of food. Instantly the ant-eater doubled his claws up as fists and gave the 'possum a sound thrashing, and had it not been that the vanquished monarch was removed from the scene of action he would have been killed.

In human society the large, fat 'possums are constantly looking down with contempt upon the humble ant-eaters, and it often happens that in the frictions of life, in the contests for wealth, political preferment and social prestige, there is a shifting of places, the proud being set down and the humble lifted up. Whatever elements of superiority may be possessed in native endowment or in earthly circumstance, a spirit that disdains those who are not so fortunate is a weakness and often occasions a heavy fall.

Roumania's Dead Greek Church Primate Sitting in State

Pride goeth before destruction, and an haughty spirit before a fall. (Prov. 16 : 18.)

Forbade Money for Religion

The will of Mrs. Nannie F. Allen, of Malden, Mass., aunt by marriage of Mme. Lillian Nordica, was filed in the Middlesex County Probate Court recently, and in some respects is a singular document. It disposes of property worth $100,000. The will cuts off all of her own blood relations entirely, with the explanation that the estate originally belonged to her husband, John W. Allen, and discriminates between her husband's relatives by leaving nothing to those whom she believed to be endowed with plenty of this world's goods. Mrs. Allen qualified her bequests still further by ordering that the legatees shall each make oath and sign an affidavit that they will devote no part of their legacies to church or religious purposes.

It is not an unusual thing to see a man crazed with evil passions, or frozen with materialism, casting slurs on religion, but it is a rare thing to see a woman who is an open skeptic or a bitter scoffer. There must have been some want in the mental make-up or some strange perversion of religious faculty in Mrs. Allen, which prompted her, on the verge of another world, to express such a deep-seated contempt for Christ and his religion.

How long, ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity? and the scorners delight in their scorning, and fools hate knowledge? (Prov. 1 : 22.)

Maxim Silent Gun Forbidden

The police department of Pittsburg has forbidden the use of the Maxim silent gun. The superintendent of police in that city, Thomas A. McQuaide, said: "There is no question in my mind that the use of the 'silencer' will prove disastrous to the peace of every city where precautions aganst its use are not taken. With a 'silencer' attached to his revolver, a thug or murderer could stand a hundred feet away from his victim, shoot him, and then make his escape without fear of detection. Highwaymen at present seldom use a revolver except to intimidate pedestrians. The risk of shooting is too great; the discharge of the weapon makes too much noise and attracts too many people. But with a 'silencer' in use, this would be different." The penalty of the Pennsylvania law against the silent gun is a heavy fine and a year's imprisonment as the extreme limit.

The deed of murder is diabolical enough as it is, and society is not likely to tolerate any invention that will encourage it.

Grant not, O Lord, the desires of the wicked: further not his wicked device. (Ps. 140 : 8.)

Children and Lighted Matches

Of the 8,642 fires, which caused a total loss of more than $6,000,000 in New York City during 1908, 1,112 were directly caused by carelessness with matches. No other causes approximated this account according to the report. Fire Marshal Peter Seery points out that thoughtless mothers, who leave their children alone with matches in reach, are morally responsible for at least 371 of these conflagrations and the attending loss of life. On one day recently two children were burned to death in different parts of the city of New York; in each instance by a fire which they had started with matches in play. A fireman rescued a little girl in a house uptown, but she was so badly burned that she died at the hospital. The other victim was a little girl, the youngest of five children. She and her sister were in the basement flat, the door of which the mother had locked while she was busy in the building. The children struck matches for fun, and the younger one was so severely burned that she died in a few moments.

There cannot be too great caution upon the part of parents, and those who have the custody of children, with reference to the many forms of danger that seem to be increased by our congested population and complex living. And the fearful destruction of precious life by fires from children playing with matches ought to be stopped at once.

The fire consumed their young men. (Ps. 78 : 63.)

WINNING A CONSTRUCTION CAMP

A Winter's Day at the Cable Camp

Four Men of the Camp

The Y. M. C. A. Building in the Construction Camp

By W. H. DAY, Secretary R. R. Y. M. C. A.

"IF you are looking for a really hard field in which to start Railroad Y. M. C. A. work, I would suggest that you visit Taft, Mont." Thus spoke a railroad official, as I sat in his office in St. Paul about a year ago. Four days later I was in the office of a railroad president in Seattle, and was telling him of the splendid results which were being secured through Railroad Young Men's Christian Associations in construction camps on the C., M. & St. P. Railroad in South Dakota. Turning to me, he said, "The neediest railroad construction camp I know of is at Taft, Mont.; and I would suggest that you visit it as soon as possible."

As I alighted from the train at Taft and walked around the end of the boxcar depot, I looked down the street and felt that the "half had not been told." The buildings, comprising one street of the town, consisted of a postoffice, eighteen saloons and an undertaker's tent. I met the superintendent of the construction camp, and told him of my mission. "I have a high regard for the Y. M. C. A.," said he, "because of what it has done for my boy in Evanston; but I do not think it would be any use to try to work it out here." As we stood talking we could hear the piano in one of the saloons, and, nodding in that direction, he said, "That's what sends men to the bad. These men get so restless for amusement that when they hear that music they cannot stay away from it." I explained that that was one feature which the Young Men's Christian Association provided in its buildings.

I spent the night as a guest at the camp, which is two and one-half miles from the town of Taft, and is the point where the C., M. & St. P. R. R. is building its long tunnel through the Rocky Mountains. I found, as is usually the case, that the men had no place to spend their time when not working, though the physical comfort of the men was provided for better than is usually the case. We talked until late into the night of the work which the Y. M. C. A. was doing throughout the world and especially for railroad men, and when I left the camp the next morning the superintendent said to me, "You send us out a secretary and we will take good care of him." A few weeks later a Y. M. C. A. secretary was on the ground, and in a short time a building was erected at a convenient spot in the camp, equipped with writing tables, checkers, chess, phonograph, etc., the company paying for all this, as well as the salary of the secretary. The place was brilliantly lighted with electric current from the company's power-house, and the men flocked into it. Every evening the place was packed with men reading, writing, playing games, using the phonograph, etc. Expressions of appreciation were heard from the men, and the manner in which they always hurried to the building after supper indicated how eager they were for the social centre where they could read and write letters in comfort.

The Y. M. C. A. arranged for the cashing of pay checks, which had formerly been cashed by saloons, and drinking decreased. War was declared on the saloons because they encouraged vice and gambling. The county officials were appealed to, but they refused to act. So strenuous was the opposition to their law-breaking on the part of the secretary that the deputy, whose salary was paid by the saloonkeepers, arrested him for carrying concealed weapons, although he had been granted permission.

On the following Sunday evening he recited the history of the town: told how men had been ruined through this nefarious business, and of his opposition to the law-breaking. As he finished, one of the men, acting as spokesman, said, "Morrison, you give the word, and we will go down there and put those places so that they will surely never bother you again." "No," said Morrison, "that would not be right; but this is what I wish you would do: cut the whole outfit; they are expecting you all down there on Christmas Day, and are making special preparations. We are going to have a good time here in camp, and I want to urge every man in this room to stay here." A big Christmas tree was secured and tastily trimmed by the three ladies in the camp. After a service of song and story, the secretary gave a splendid Christmas talk, which took back many of the men to their childhood days. Next day, those who were not working spent their time at the building, and Christmas passed with scarcely a man going to town. More than $8,000 in checks was received by the secretary, to be deposited or sent home. The boss stated before Christmas that he would probably have to put on one hundred new men because of those who would be unfit for work the day after. To his great surprise only three men were in that condition out of the entire camp of two hundred and fifty. The contractor in charge of this work recently wrote to a fellow-contractor that he would not undertake another large job without requesting that a Railroad Young Men's Christian Association be organized in the camp; for, though it is his first experiment, he was convinced that the results of this work, aside from its religious influence, helped to make the men steady and contented; that it very largely abolished drinking among the men; that they are encouraged to save their money, which would otherwise be spent in the saloons. Instead of men becoming uneasy and moving from camp, he finds that by giving them a place to spend their evenings in a social way, under the direction of a man who takes a personal interest in them, there is better work accomplished.

WOMAN'S NEW ERA IN THE FAR EAST

a thing as education. Upon opening day, the girl appears, carried in a sedan chair, for no high-class Chinese girl would think of walking in the street. She would surely be looked at, and that, from a Chinese standard, would be unpleasant and mortifying—a thing not to be thought of, outside of the lower classes. Her wardrobe, which is usually a very scant one, is folded in a piece of cotton cloth. Among her belongings will be found a luncheon box and a fire-basket. These she will not be allowed to carry into the classrooms, but may have in the corridor or bedroom. It is rather difficult to get our girls to take exercise; they are accustomed to an indoor life."

"Do you teach the languages?"

"We teach English only. The Chinese are not linguists, but every girl is anxious to know English. The usual course includes astronomy, geography, mathematics, algebra, and some Chinese classics—quite much," said Mrs. Ah Hok. "Calisthenics are taught, and music—the pupils are very fond of that; also drawing, painting, lace-making and embroidery. Embroidery is considered the most important branch of a girl's education, and great stress, too, is laid upon the study of etiquette. This means the serving of tea, the bowing and reception etiquette and table conventionalities. Certain phrases are demanded by different occasions. Well-bred persons will make no mistakes. It is the polite thing to go as far as the outer door with a departing guest. In that case, the guest will say, 'Please go within'; but if the parting is inside the house, then the departing one says, 'Please be seated,' which means, 'you must not take the trouble to go to the door with me.' The person addressed usually insists upon doing so."

"Is there any disposition toward co-education?"

"Not much; that must come very slowly in China. But who can say?"

When I asked whether any religious instruction was given in the schools, madam replied by asking, "What religion would you teach? Of course, the Buddhist religion is instilled into the pupils in heathen schools, just as we try to bring Christian influence to bear in Christian schools. But even in the latter schools, it is difficult to teach Christianity to girls of the higher class."

"Are Chinese girls bright?"

"Some are bright and some are not bright; some are lazy and some industrious," was the quick reply.

When, at parting with Mrs. Ah Hok, I congratulated her upon the methods of Chinese education, she answered brightly:

"I like yours better."

THE SCOURGE OF SYRIA AND ITS RELIEF

PANORAMIC VIEW OF BRUMANNA, LEBANON, IN THE HIGHLANDS OF SYRIA

A WOMAN came down from the Nusaireeyeh Mountains in Northern Lebanon to the Mission Hospital in Tripoli, Syria. The religion of her people—a sort of conglomerate of debased Islam, debased Christianity, and ancient paganism—had taught her that women have no souls. Because she is destitute of a soul, a Nusairey woman never sits down in the presence of a man, not even her husband or her father; she never eats at the same table with brother or son, and she believes herself to be of a lower order, like the beasts that perish. This poor woman, while undergoing a most painful operation at the Mission Hospital, learned the wonderful fact that women have souls—that she had a soul!

The woman was enchanted. Who, so richly endowed, could repine at agonizing pain? How well worth while it had been to suffer, almost unto death, for the sake of this wonderful new knowledge! The days of pain were days of ecstasy, for she had a soul!

But when the time came for her to go home cured, she hesitated; her husband would never believe the wonderful truth. Yet he must believe it! All her acquaintances must know the marvelous fact that she had a soul, that all the women of her village, her nation, had souls. She begged Dr. Harris to write to her husband the almost incredible fact that his wife had a soul. Armed with this letter from one whose word no Syrian has ever doubted, this poor woman, so suddenly become rich, went joyfully back to her mountains.

The Sanatorium in the Nusaireeyeh Mountains

In Syria, the one woman whom the Turkish government permits to practise medicine is Dr. Mary P. Eddy. She is the child of parents who together gave a full century of work to the evangelization of Syria. Tuberculosis is the scourge of Syria. For generations past, it has been the custom to cast out of the house any member of a family—even a mother or an eldest son—who gives evidence of being attacked by this dreaded disease. The sufferings of these poor wretches have been beyond description, and one cannot wonder that many, in dread of being cast out, have carefully concealed their state until the patient has become past help.

Many such poor creatures have come to Dr. Mary as with her hospital tent and her helpers she has itinerated during the long summer through the high valleys and among the mountain villages of Lebanon; have come to her too late for bodily help, but not for gracious teaching of the love of Christ and the salvation he has wrought. A hospital and camp for tuberculosis patients became an imperative necessity.

The Syria Mission, recognizing the urgency of the need, a few months ago voted her authority to begin the work, but money it had none to give. In direct answer to her prayers, there came from friends in distant America the funds needed for the purchase of a building. On the crest of the foothills of Lebanon, under the very shadow of snow-clad Mt. Keneesey, "the Jungfrau of Syria," four thousand feet above the sea, and looking down over pines and palms to the blue Mediterranean, some people four years ago put up a large building. It was suited in size and situation to be a sanatorium, and Dr. Mary Eddy purchased it a few months ago. Since then she has enlarged the windows and added balconies where patients can take the open-air cure. The house has sixteen rooms and two wards. Directly across the valley lies Brumanna, where several years ago the first interdenominational missionary conference in the Turkish Empire was held.

"I am pleased with this place as a centre for missionary work," wrote Dr. Eddy. "The preacher from Bhamdun has offered to hold a service here every Sabbath afternoon. Yesterday many came—forty-three this first Sabbath. We are especially welcomed by the Druses, who live in the neighboring villages. People will flock here from all parts of the mountains."

Money is needed for furnishing, for table and kitchen utensils, for bedding, for running expenses, and for the salary of a nurse. Dr. Eddy possessed sixteen bedsteads; the carpenter who put up the balconies made a few tables and chairs, and with these and a few gifts, she opened the sanatorium last June. Sixty stood ready to come, had it been possible to receive them. Those whom she could receive are living in the most primitive way. An English trained nurse has agreed to take the post of head nurse at a nominal salary. There may be some reader of this article who, as a thank offering for recovery from illness, or for the spared life of a dear one, will contribute toward the work. Dr. Eddy is convinced that, once fairly started, the sanatorium will be self-supporting. Small sums could be used to supply galvanized tableware, and for bedding, and especially for blankets. Semi-tropical though Syria is, snow lies on this four-thousand-foot elevation for weeks at a time, and cold blasts blow from mountains of nearly perpetual snow. Any gifts in aid of the work may be sent to Mrs. William K. Eddy, who is now on furlough in this country, and who may be addressed at Wooster, O., or they can be sent directly to Dr. Mary P. Eddy, care of the French Postoffice, Beirut, Syria.

The Shady Grounds of the Mission

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—Rev. Dr. Torrey has been holding mammoth revival services at Montgomery, Ala. The Auditorium, seating 5,000, has been crowded nightly, Many conversions are reported.

—Evangelist H. W. Bromley, of Inwood, Ia., held meetings lately at Loup City, Neb., in the M. E. Church, Rev. J. O. Hawk, pastor. There were over a hundred professions. Many family altars were erected. Sixty-one united with the church.

—Miss Grace Hildebrand, the "Gospel Nightingale," lately conducted a series of evangelistic song services in the Baptist Church at Towner's, N. Y., with marked spiritual results. Twenty-five joined the church. All the services were largely attended.

—Rev. J. Robert Campbell, pastor of the First Baptist Church, Beaver Falls, Pa., writes: "We are having a wonderful revival here, under the leadership of Evangelist George Coker, of New York. The number of converts has exceeded the number of our membership. The whole community is stirred."

—Evangelists R. J. Smith and J. Cal. Luttrell, of Rush, Tex., held a series of revival meetings at Frankston, Tex., extending over twenty-one days. Much good was accomplished, and the churches were greatly revived.

—Evangelists Hart and Magann, of Fairbury, Ill., have just closed a notable revival in Binghamton, N. Y. About one thousand made definite profession of saving faith, and hundreds of others expressed a desire to become Christians. At the men's meetings some four thousand attended, and hundreds confessed Christ. The closing Sabbath, over twelve thousand people attended the various services, and more than a hundred confessed Christ.

—Ex-President Roosevelt has just become the recipient of a presentation copy of the Methodist Discipline, in accordance with a vote of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church when in session in Washington last May. The copy was specially bound in the finest black morocco, and enclosed in a leather case, lined with heavy grosgrain silk of dark blue. The presentation was made by Joseph B. Hingeley, of Chicago, secretary of the General Conference.

—There are no more enthusiastic open-air workers than the superintendent of the West Side Mission of New York and her assistants. Experience has shown them the value of open-air meetings as a soul-winning agency. From seven to eight o'clock every night, in good weather, the mission band, with organ and cornet, sings and preaches the Gospel to an attentive company on the street corner. Mrs. Clemme Ellis White is the superintendent. The West Side Gospel Mission is supported by voluntary contributions, which come largely from converts of the mission.

—Evangelist W. H. Collinson, of the Missionary Home, 728 East 222d Street, New York, has been carrying on a home mission work in the Bronx for the last ten years. During that time he has opened and conducted four missions, a large Gospel tent, and has conducted open-air services in three different sections of New York City, besides doing much charitable work among the poor and the sick. His work is supported solely by contributions.

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

The Mother's Duty to Herself

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"SHE is such a devoted mother. She has not spent a night away from home in nine years. Yes, as you say, she is settling down into middle age much too soon; but how can she help it when she spends her whole time and energy in bringing up her children?"

The speaker, who was one of two ladies conversing audibly on a ferryboat, passed on to other topics, but the phrase, "a devoted mother," lingered in the thought of a listener who could not help overhearing her words. "A devoted mother." What does the phrase mean? Devotion carries in it the tradition of sacrifice. A woman wholly devoted to her children day by day offers up her vitality, her talents, her education, her possibilities in other directions, at their shrine. On the altar of her children she lays herself not infrequently, shall we say, as a burnt sacrifice. By the time that they are grown, and are no longer in need of her incessant vigilance, she has ceased to be their cheery comrade and their wisest counselor. Granting that it is never safe to generalize and that no rule is without its exceptions, still the mother who is contented to let all her brain pathways run into the single rut of maternity is in danger of growing old too soon, if not of dropping prematurely into the grave.

There are mothers who never have the opportunity to take an outing, even a short one, while their children are young. They have no one with whom to leave their little ones, and every mother who has tried it knows that to take children from home in a visit is by no means an easy task. Often, too, relatives and friends do not feel equal to entertaining an entire household. The mother is obliged to stay at home. There is no especial merit in this. It is the misfortune of the situation. In these days when babies are brought up according to an approved and hygienic system, a mother who has any one to relieve her can get away from her cares for a few hours at least, and is often the better if she slip away for a day or two. Children will need their mother long after infancy is over. The growing girls and boys, with their studies, their hopes and ambitions, their associations and amusements, require the mother's companionship every step of the way. Her duty to them and her duty to herself are closely interwoven. If, through a false ideal of devotion, she permits herself to wear out while she is still young, she commits an irretrievable folly.

I fancy I hear a chorus of remonstrance from mothers whose day begins at early dawn and ends almost at midnight, whose weary round of care and labor is never done. The burden of the remonstrance is this: How are we to help ourselves? The answer is, train the children to be self-helpful, and to help you. Let the father assume his proper share of responsibility in home management, and give him the privilege of assisting in rearing up the children. Insist every day on securing a little while for absolute rest. Do not drop every pursuit that once pleased you. In the department of sewing, for instance, keep on hand a little dainty needlework, and do not limit your endeavors to letting down Bessie's frocks and patching Tommy's trousers. You should allow yourself the pleasure of reading entertaining books from time to time. The best books for a mother's reading will form the subject of another talk. In the meantime, I invite frank correspondence on the views presented.

THE FUTURE MIKADO AND HIS BROTHERS

Probably no royal heir in the world has before him a more brilliant destiny than the future Mikado of Japan. His empire has made immense strides in greatness during the last century, and it will hereafter be reckoned with as a world power of the highest eminence. When the young prince shall come to his throne he will wield a sceptre inferior to none on the globe.

Old Wounds Healed

Our Civil War has passed into history. The young people of to-day, who have been born and brought up since the clash of arms between the States came to an end, have no thought of the intensity of that struggle. In the swift and hurrying march of events it seems to them as remote almost as the Revolution. Northland and Southland have together celebrated the centennial of Lincoln, and to both the fame of Washington is equally precious. A significant proof of the restored friendly and fraternal relations in this nation once at feud, but now at peace, was given recently in Congress when the Hon. John H. Stephens presented an extraordinary petition. At the instance of a number of ex-Confederate veterans, he asked Congress to increase the pension of an aged Federal soldier from $12 to $75 a month, that in his declining years a helpless paralytic might have the care and comfort he needed. The men who fought have long been reconciled. There is no longer enmity between the blue and the gray, and this token of good will and brotherly love on the part of large-hearted and gallant Southern men is honorable to them and gratifying to all who hear of it. It may be added that Congress granted the petition. The name of the Federal soldier thus relieved is William Lanham, and our information comes from Texas.

Forty Days of Lent

MATERIAL as we fancy the age, and dominant as are the affairs of the world, the Church still lays its imperative hand on world and age alike. The influence of religion is still potential in the earth. The Christian year has its feasts and its fasts. The longest and most impressive of the latter falls at the end of winter and the return of spring, and summons us, during forty days, to put the emphasis of life on humility and prayer. True, business and pleasure proceed without interruption during these consecrated days, yet both are aware of a new influence that cannot be ignored or successfully striven against. Lent enfolds the world in an atmosphere of peace and blessing. In the cities there are prayer meetings at noon, and the invitation at many open sanctuary doors to the jaded man of business, the society woman, and indeed to the many-sided passing throng, is to enter and tarry a little while for a service of praise and prayer. There are morning and afternoon services, too, and these are not merely held in churches of the Episcopal and Roman Catholic communions. More and more it is becoming customary for churches of diverse Protestant denominations to keep Lent as a means of spiritual growth and refreshment.

A word may be said in favor of the class of women whose possession of wealth and leisure enables them to give most attention to social engagements. They have been absorbed during the earlier winter in a round of engagements, not all of which have been in the line of fashionable amusement. The society woman of to-day is often a scientific student, is a patron of art, is interested in music and gives a large portion of time to committee work and to charity. She has, of course, her long calling list, and her time is taken up with so many diversions that she is in peril of nervous exhaustion by the time the season is over. Lent brings to her a glad relief, yet she and her daughters seldom let the forty days go by without in some way filling them with altruistic work for orphans and the poor.

What gift has Lent for us this year? The question is worth our asking, and each of us must make an individual reply. Perhaps it will perform for us its most beneficent office if, instead of trying to spend all its sweet hours in toil and task, we sometimes sit still and listen quietly and reverently for the voice and the message of the Christ. Shall we not let our Saviour minister to us in the hallowed season of Lent?

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—E. B. I cannot advise any one to marry in haste. Those who do so frequently repent at leisure. A sufficient time for acquaintance should elapse between the lovers' first meeting and their engagement. Three days, which you suggest, is not enough. Three months would be a more sensible interval.

—CHILDISH RESPONSIBILITY. In the eyes of the law a child is an infant until it arrives at legal maturity. In reality, children mature at different stages. Babyhood is soon left behind, and a child of seven is old enough to understand most of the actual differences between right and wrong. The moral training of a child begins in the cradle.

Called to Serve*

THE exact meaning of Christ's noble exhortations to "leave all and follow me," has been the theme of endless discussions. The helpless, aging father or mother, the dependent brothers and sisters, cannot be left to themselves, no matter how fervent may be the faith of a disciple nor his conviction that his duty calls him to the field of foreign missions.

The interpretation lies in this case, as in many others, in the treatment of Christ's commands as a figure. We are to place self-sacrifice, the doing of good to others, so far above all care for self that the latter is practically unconsidered. It is only the strong Oriental way of presenting general truths, especially new ones, which are likely to be widely at variance with existing customs.

This truth, that in order to serve Christ acceptably all earthly loves must be forsaken, was eminently unacceptable to the mind of that pleasure-seeking age. The spirit of Rome, with all its selfishness and its brutal dissipation, was abroad in all its provinces.

Their governors generally came from Rome. Most of them had lived there for longer or shorter periods, and had become corrupted with its magnificent debaucheries. In every smaller city the luxury of the mighty capital was emulated, until no tiniest hamlet remained untouched by the awful sensuality of the age.

Yet here was an ascetic, who, while he fellowshipped with publicans and sinners, was not of them; who counseled forgetfulness of self, the forsaking of personal pleasure—the adoption of almost every principle which was foreign to the accepted code of the great.

But the simple forsaking and giving up of lesser things for the greater is, as President Hyde reminds us, merely a negative service. Christ demands more than this. After all has been renounced—then, the strait path—and the crown of thorns. "But the cross is transfigured into a crown of rejoicing, the sacrifice is transformed into privilege and pleasure. . . . It is the dearest and sweetest experience of life, the supreme expression of the Christian spirit."

Dr. Timothy Richard, in the New York Independent, well describes the progress of the true convert in his attempt to follow his Lord. He is, perhaps, filled with the mystic fervor of his first enthusiasm, as the new life opens before him. But the endeavors to "improve himself devotionally," to enjoy the vague rapture of spiritual communion with Christ, amount to nothing unless they are followed by "strivings to improve men materially, intellectually and nationally. . . . This, only, is a conversion toward the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth"—the real following in the hard footsteps of Jesus Christ, the Saviour of men.

The heart of the loving Christian, as he contemplates the sufferings of his Leader, has felt, through all the ages, the strong impulse to assist him.

See the King—I would help him but cannot, the wishes fall through.
Could I wrestle to raise him from sorrow, grow poor to enrich,
To fill up his life, starve my own out, I would, knowing which,
I know that my service is perfect.

But the service is not perfect, nor can it be, until the desire to help the King has been demonstrated by active help rendered to his little ones—our brethren—utterly forsaking the service of self.

Life Lessons from Proverbs*

NO book in the Bible compares with that of Proverbs for practical advice. So universally is this conceded that many Christians have said that it is lacking in spirituality, and even that it verges upon sordidness.

Poorly and superficially must such men have studied these wonderful chapters. That profound Bible student, Matthew Arnold, writes in his "Letters": "I have just read my daily chapter in the Bock of Proverbs: 'The name of the Lord is a strong tower. The righteous runneth into it and is safe.' How delicious!" If this highly cultured and lofty mind could so appreciatively read a daily chapter in this great book, it cannot be "sordid."

It is true that but little of order or sequence is observed in the arrangement of the chapters. Every admirer of the Book of Ecclesiasticus, which many critics have considered fit for the sacred canon, must remark the strong resemblance which it bears to Proverbs. It is said that halves of verses in the one book find their complement in the other. Certainly many of the sentiments in the two are identical.

The Oriental mind seems naturally to relish the epigram—the presentation of separate truths in new, brief, striking forms. Every Eastern literature abounds in such sayings.

The poetic quality of the Book of Proverbs is frequently undervalued. Think of the many strong and beautiful figures that it contains. Among them are the apples of gold in pictures of silver; the path of the just, shining more and more unto the perfect day; wisdom, as the silver of the mines, and as hid treasure, to be gained only by great effort; the heart, as the source of the issues of life; man, as a roe pursued by the hunter, or a bird by the fowler; the need of the vision, without which the people perish; the hope deferred, which maketh the heart sick; and scores of others. The subject of the poetry of the Proverbs would be an excellent one for a sermon. Tennyson speaks of Proverbs as

Jewels five words long
That on the stretch'd forefinger of all Time
Sparkle forever.

Earl Russell defines them as the wisdom of many and the art of few. It was said by the great Dr. South that upon the Proverbs rests the fame of Solomon as the wisest of men. His were almost innumerable; while each of the seven noted wise men of Greece acquired his great reputation by a single sentence, consisting of only two or three words.

Perhaps the most far-seeing and anachronistic wisdom displayed in this book concerns the status of woman—in that age, even among the Jews, regarded as distinctly inferior to man, and usually relegated to the harem. In the Proverbs we have the description of a woman so progressive and independent and enlightened that even the American woman has not yet attained unto her. She is the embodiment of strength—very different from our own ailing, sanitarium-seeking ladies, who, in the words of Frances E. Willard, are suffering from "generations of pinched waists and feet, the cerebellum overheated by its wads of hair, the vital organs cramped, the free step impeded, and the gracious human form bandaged and dwarfed."

Solomon's model woman knew no such restrictions, and her unexampled usefulness and noble achievement resulted from her perfect health, so that her husband and children rose up and called her blessed, and her works were written in the gates, the most prominent place in the city.

possession, the soldiers and the rabble which accompanied them spread themselves like a cloud of locusts over the surrounding villages. The villagers were unarmed and they were Gezidees, whom the Moslems regard as worse than infidels. Accordingly, the soldiers began to shoot down the men in cold blood, to abuse the women, and take captive their maidens. These horrible atrocities caused a stampede of the villagers, who fled in every direction. The road to Wevan Shehir was strewn with babies and little children, whom their mothers could no longer carry. It was estimated that some 500 were so abandoned, and died of hunger and exposure, and were devoured by dogs and birds of prey. The deserted villagers were stripped of their supplies and equipment, and many adobe houses burned to the ground.

"A commission of inquiry was appointed to investigate these frightful outrages. It visited Wevan Shehir, and found the high officials, civil and military, deeply involved in the plundering. The commission practically whitewashed them. The sufferers appealed to the high commissioners sent from Constantinople."

Mr. Andrus then proceeds to estimate the number of villagers in the different localities who are in need of relief, and in concluding his letter he makes a strong appeal for them. In one section alone, 212 Christians, representing 50 families, are now depending upon the Mardin missionaries for support. Besides these, there is a very large number of Gezidees around Mardin, who have been partially helped. Eighteen villages of the Shikvian tribes around Wevan Shehir, embracing some 1,726 souls, and five other vilages, representing 475 souls, are also homeless and in peril of death from starvation. In the Kusv region there are eighteen Danadeeyah villages with 260 families, or about 1,245 souls, all in the same pitiful condition. These are not Arabs, nor Moslem Koords, but peaceful villagers, among whom the missionaries were laboring hopefully when the cruel blow fell which robbed them of everything and drove them out into the world. Mr. Andrus lays the pitiful case of these people before the benevolent Christian world, and asks for aid to give them food, shelter and a new start in life.

A brief statement regarding them was published recently in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and our readers responding to the need sent contributions, which we forwarded to Mr. Andrus, though knowing little of the frightful problem of massacre, rapine and suffering with which the missionaries had been brought face to face. With the money already sent they have done wonders in the way of relief work, and hundreds of these wretched survivors are being kept alive by the generosity of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. We ask our friends who have already done so many noble works of Christlike charity to take under consideration the case of these poor homeless families and hold up the missionaries' hands in the work they have undertaken. Any contributions sent to this journal will be publicly acknowledged and forwarded to Mr. Andrus, to aid him and his associates in the life-saving work.

SPECIAL TO OUR YOUNG FRIENDS

EVERY boy and girl who sees this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should do two things at once: first, read very carefully every word of the special announcement of our Junior Department, which appears on the inside front cover; and, second, write to us to-day for ten FREE copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and our Booklet for Junior Agents.

This Booklet tells you exactly how you should go to work to become one of our Junior Agents, and gives a full list of the generous rewards which we offer in addition to a liberal cash commission on every copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD you sell. These rewards are the very things that all boys and girls most love; all sorts of delightful things from Pocket Knives, and a big, fat Jack-Knife, to a most wonderful Automatic Rotary Printing Press, that comes complete, with two fonts of different styles of type, black ink, gold bronze, paper, and other materials, and will print anything from a visiting card to an announcement. For little girls there is the "Midget Artistic" Watch, and for our little men a splendid "Defiance Watch," that any boy would be proud to carry; then there is a beautiful gold-filled Signet Ring, a drab, deerskin-finish Catcher's Mitt, a fine Camera, and Roller Skates; a "Diamond-point" Fountain Pen, a good-size real Electric Engine, with a fly-wheel that makes 1,500 revolutions per minute, a fascinating Vest-Pocket Electric Light, and other Gifts no less attractive. So you can easily see that these special rewards, in addition to the cash profit allowed on every copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sold, make our proposition so generous that you have a wonderful incentive to enlist in our Junior Agents' work and then "get out and hustle for all you are worth."

This is Your opportunitv to earn a weekly income for spending money.

Our grown-up agents in all parts of the country make good profits selling THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and there is every reason why YOU should do as well and even better than your elders because you have more time and more energy and because all the world likes to help along bright boys and girls who show enthusiasm in their work and never forget to be polite and courteous. Surely there are lots of people in your town to whom you could sell THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and after you once get a start the work will be easy. At least it is well worth your time to make a trial effort, and we will help you to succeed in every way that we possibly can. The first thing is to write for our Booklet and sample copies of the paper. In writing simply say, "Kindly send me first ten copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and full particulars of your Junior Agency Work." Sign your full name and address and mail your letter to

Clearing a Church Debt

ONE of the most unique methods of clearing a church debt was inaugurated recently by the "Be and Do Society" of the Knox Presbyterian Church, Hyde Park, near Cincinnati, for the building fund of the church. In a card, sent out by the officials, it is announced that $400 can be raised "by going one-half mile after it." The half-mile trip, it is explained, is to be traveled one foot at a time, and "sixteen pennies, placed side by side, will cover a foot of the distance." Friends of the church are asked to travel a foot or more, by placing pennies to cover that distance in a little silk bag, which is enclosed with the card. They are to bring the bag to a Colonial reception, to be held at the church. The plan works admirably, and can be tried in other churches to advantage. F. J. KOCH.

THE GENTILES' PENTECOST*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

"IN Cæsarea," Roman capital of Judea, a city on the Mediterranean coast, forty-seven miles northwest of Jerusalem, built B.C. 10; said now to be one of the most desolate sights in all Palestine.

"A centurion of the band." In the Roman army one hundred men constituted a "century," or band, and the officer in command was a centurion. In the United States Army, a company at full strength numbers one hundred men and its commander is called a captain.

"Cornelius, a devout man, and one that feared God" (verse 2). He was one of the first Roman converts to Christianity. Before Peter's visit he kept the hours of prayer in his home (Acts 10:30). "He saw in a vision openly." Four accounts are given of this vision: Acts 10:1-7; 10:22; 10:30-32; 11:13, 14. Let them all be read. "He called two of his household servants, and a devout soldier." These were "saints of his household." He selected them as the messengers the angel in the vision said he should send to Joppa for the apostle Peter. Joppa was about fifteen miles down the coast from Cæsarea. They arrived in Joppa about noon on the day after Cornelius had seen the vision. They probably did not start until the early morning of that day.

"Peter went up on the housetop to pray," not to be seen of men, but because it was the place where prayer was usually made, the house being surrounded by a high balustrade. Noontide was the second regular time for daily prayer in the Jewish calendar.

"He fell into a trance"—intense mental exaltation, under the power of the Holy Spirit. "He beholdeth the heaven opened," etc.; not a rift in the sky overhead, but in holy imagination. "Wherein were all manner of four-footed beasts and creeping things of the earth, and fowls of the heaven." These objects Peter seemed to see collected together in a sheet, which was, perhaps, like the sail of a ship, let down by four corners on the earth. "Rise, Peter, kill and eat," so Peter heard in this vision. He was mystified, and interpreted the vision literally, with no thought of its spiritual meaning, and he refused to eat because he was a Jew, and there were animals before him which a Jew might not eat, because they were forbidden by the law of Moses, as "unclean."

"What God hath cleansed, make not thou common." God had to rebuke him three times and then take away the vision, waiting for what should occur to make the truth clear to Peter. "Peter was much perplexed in himself." He pondered what the vision might mean.

"Behold, three men seek thee." So said the Spirit to Peter while he was considering the meaning of the vision. They were the men sent by Cornelius. Then came the command of God to Peter: "Arise, and get thee down, and go with them, nothing doubting;" and then the assurance, "for I have sent them." Peter did go down, and then the men told him that they had been sent by the centurion to tell him to come to his home in Cæsarea and preach the Gospel. He brought the three men into the house as guests, and on the next day he departed with them to Cæsarea, and reaching there he found the home of Cornelius filled with people, the kinsmen and near friends of Cornelius, gathered to hear the preaching of Peter. When Cornelius had told Peter about his vision, to explain why he had sent for him, Peter could interpret the vision that he himself had, and began to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles—those who had before been common and unclean in his sight. In Old Testament times God had sent a preacher to the Gentiles: Jonah, to the Ninevites.

Diamond-like Truth

Truth is like a diamond, because it has many flashing points of light. In the passage now under our consideration we see: (1) how prayer should be made; (2) that God listens to and answers prayer; (3) that God expects obedience from his followers; (4) that all men, of every tribe and nation, are entitled to Gospel preaching; (5) that to promote the brotherhood of man is the duty of the Christian.

They pray the best, who pray and watch;
They watch the best, who watch and pray:
They hear Christ's fingers on the latch,
Whether he come by night or day.
Whether they guard the gates and watch,
Or patient, toil and pray and watch,
They hear his fingers on the latch,
Whether he early comes, or late.
—ANONYMOUS.

In a group of friends who were discussing prayer some one observed that it was a curious fact that no man could do one thing and think of another. A little girl of ten years was listening, and she said, "I can do one thing and think of another." "What is it?" asked her father. "Well," she said, "it is very easy for me to say the Lord's Prayer and think of almost anything else I want to. I do it every night." This reminds us of the Buddhist's prayer-wheel. Those who use such a machine as this rattle away at their prayers, paying no attention to the meaning, whether they know it or not. Prayers are printed and put inside of the wheel, and when the wheel is turned all of the prayers contained in the machine are supposed to be repeated. Each repetition is believed to have a certain efficacy, and the praying machine was invented because mouth repetitions were too slow. The Christian who repeats a prayer, "thinking of almost anything else," is only another kind of praying machine. There is truth for the older ones—none too old—in what we teach the children.

To pray is not to pray,
Unless I mean the words I say.

And here is a beautiful prayer for a child:

Thou that once on mother's knee
Wert a little child like me,
When I wake or go to bed,
Lay thy hands about my head;
Let me feel thee very near,
Jesus Christ, our Saviour dear.

As to God Hearing Prayer

The vision which Cornelius had was a direct answer to prayer, immediate answer (Acts 10:30-33). Another instance of the same kind was given to Daniel, for even while he was praying a hand touched him, the hand of a glorious heavenly being, who said: "O Daniel, thou man greatly beloved, understand the words that I speak unto thee, and stand upright; for unto thee am I now sent; from the day that thou didst set thy heart to understand, and to humble thyself before thy God, thy words were heard; and I am come for thy word's sake" (Dan. 10:11, 12).

It has been said that "prayer changes impotence into omnipotence." We are told that there is nothing which prayer cannot do. Dr. Guthrie, of Scotland, said, "Prayer has just two limits: the first is, that its range is confined to the promises, but, within these, what a bank of wealth, what a mine of mercies, what a store of blessings! The second is, that God will grant or deny our requests as is best for his glory and our good. And who that knows how we are, in a sense, but children would wish it otherwise?"

Mr. Moody, in one of his addresses, told the following incident: "Only a few nights ago, in Philadelphia, a mother came to one of the prayer meetings with the burden of her two sons on her heart. They were going fast to ruin. They had well-nigh broken her heart. They had just gone on a drunken spree, and no doubt their end would be a drunkard's grave. Her heart was burdened, and she said, 'Oh, cry to God for my two boys.' The boys had made an appointment to meet each other at the corner of Market and Thirteenth Streets. While one was at the corner waiting for his brother to come, he went into the meeting at the Depot Building. The Spirit of God met him there, and he found his way to the cross. Right over the way at the young men's meeting the other brother found Christ. The one who was at the Depot Building got home first. While he and his mother were praying and weeping together, the second son came in. Wasn't that a quick answer to prayer? Those two brothers in Philadelphia are among the most active in bringing their friends to Christ."

God Hears a Chinaman's Prayer

God is no respecter of persons. A couple of Chinamen were standing in a peach orchard. The time of pale pink blossoms was past, and the trees were filled with greenish fruit, just beginning to show a soft gold. Shao, the owner, discovered a deadly worm had appeared, which destroys all before it. His Buddhist neighbors were busy burning joss sticks in front of their prayer shrine, in order to scare the plague from their own patches, and sounding gongs in their family altars to frighten away the worm devil. Shao, being a Christian, sought the native Christian pastor and laid his trouble before him. "I depend upon the peach sale to provide sustenance for my family next winter," he said; "nothing now stands between us and absolute want." The pastor replied, "Except a prayer-hearing God. Let us go into the orchard, and on the spot tell our heavenly Father all about it." Under the spreading peach trees those two Christians, in quaint native costume, knelt down that summer evening, and prayed to the Lord of the peach harvest that even now the ravages of the worm might be stayed; they told the Lord that "they themselves had no means of checking the trouble, but that he could easily deal with it if it was his purpose to use that fruit in satisfying Shao's needs. If not, they knew he had many ways of providing for his children, and would never let them lack daily bread." Two days afterward Shao went to the orchard, and saw something strewn under the peach trees. Was it unripe fruit? Was it the long, slender, green leaves? Nay! The ground was covered all over with dead worms! Jehovah had still command over his great army of locusts, cankerworms and caterpillars as he had in the days of Moses and of Joel. The trees remained in good condition, and later on produced a good crop. The story suggests a league of prayer, in which there may be two or more. We believe in leagues of prayer. This is the kind of "much speaking" that is pleasing to God. When one of our great Sunday School leaders, Mr. B. R. Jacobs, was greatly burdened in planning for the support of the Organized Sunday School Work and had laid his head upon his hands in something like agony, it was proposed that a company of Sunday School workers present should enter into a league of prayer for him. This was agreed to, and in the months that followed greater support was given to the Sunday School work than ever before.

As to Obedience

Peter was at first disobedient to the heavenly vision. Twice it had to be repeated, and twice the argument had to be used by the heavenly voice that what God counted clean could not be called unclean by him. Peter was in the line of obedience when he went down from the housetop to meet the servants of the Roman centurion, but he had first to have God's assurance, "Get thee down, and go with them, nothing doubting; for I have sent them." He was getting still more into line when he consented to go with the servants to their master's house. He completely surrendered when he began preaching the Gospel to the Gentiles in the house of Cornelius. Peter may be said to have obeyed, but he was not obedient until perhaps at the last. Some one has said: "To obey touches only habit, a decision as to what is the most comfortable thing to do; to be obedient covers intention, desire, will," when the assent of the whole nature is given. Peter obeyed, but Cornelius was obedient, for immediately he did what the heavenly vision bade him do.

A WOMAN RECRUITING OFFICER

Recruiting Army Nurses in England

WHILE strenuous efforts are being made to gain recruits for the British Territorial Army, it is interesting to note that women, as well as men, are at work. The First Aid Nursing Yeomanry Corps is a body which has not yet been officially recognized, and it has no government grant, but it has its women officers, who go about enlisting recruits to serve as army nurses. It is proposed that the corps shall consist of 1,000 mounted and 3,000 unmounted nurses. In the event of a war a detachment of them are prepared to go to the front, whether the fighting be in the United Kingdom or abroad. Troopers in the nurses' corps have to provide their own uniform, head ropes for their horses, and other items, at a total cost of about $15. Riding school and other expenses amount to about $1 a month. It is said that the daughter of a nobleman is to command the corps.

"My husband always had his coffee twice a day—thought he could not do without it," writes a N. Y. woman. "About twelve years ago he began to have bad spells.

"His head felt queer, was dizzy and sick at his stomach. The doctor would come, and prescribe for biliousness but medicines gave no permanent relief.

"In a short time the same old spells would return. This went on for years, until we dreaded these spells and feared he would become an invalid.

"A friend to whom we told the experience said it was coffee. He had been the same way and stopped drinking coffee and got well by change to well-made Postum.

"He told us to be sure to make it right, according to directions on pkg. Now we like Postum as well as coffee, and I can't remember when my husband has had a sick day.

"Those bad spells are a thing of the past. He is 64. works every day and is as spry as a boy. We have been using Postum a year and a half and are glad to have a delicious drink which does not injure us as coffee did."

The Little Doctor

A Serial Story Written for "The Christian Herald"

By AGNES LOWE ELLIS

"I WONDER where Miss Lily and George and Donald are," said Dudley suddenly to Mrs. Hunter.

Going out to the library, he found it tenantless; then, following the sound of voices, he entered the diningroom, where all three were sitting, while near them, enjoying a cup of hot coffee and a substantial lunch, sat our old friend, Jack Green. He had come over with a message from Aunt Phœbe, and Lily had invited him to have a warm lunch before going out in the cold again. Nothing loath, Jack had sat down, and in answer to George's inquiries about Betsy and the children, he entertained him with an account of the hard times and ended by wishing the Squire's folks would come back.

When Dudley made his appearance, Jack was overjoyed to see him, and if Lily had not suggested that Mrs. Langdon might be anxious if he did not return soon, there is no telling when he would have gone away.

"You see," he said, "Mrs. Langdon is going to have company to-morrow, and I'm there as a sort of handy fellow to kill chickens and get things ready." With a substantial reminder of the old friendship, from both Dudley and George, he set out at last, saying, "I'll get some little comforts for Betsy to hearten her up a bit. Thank ye, gentlemen, a thousand times."

CHAPTER XX

"WELL!" said George, "he is the same Jack Green, complaining of hard times and all too willing to rest and spend his time in gossip. I wonder if his home is at all comfortable. Suppose, Dudley, we make a visit there and see what we can do for his family."

"I agree," said Dudley.

"I wonder if I can be of any use to her," said Lily.

"That is a good idea, Miss Lily," said Dudley heartily. "A woman knows best what a woman needs. I have a very interesting patient in New York, a Spanish woman, whom I wish you could visit. If you lived there, I should surely press you into service. She is the person of whom I spoke to you, George.

"She has apparently no relatives in this country, and although she is deeply grateful for all that I do for her, she never speaks of her family or home, and I cannot bring myself to ask her any questions. Some physicians seem to consider their poor patients as simply machines to be put in order by their skill, and do not hesitate to draw out their most sacred inner thoughts and family secrets. Sometimes I blush for a profession that has such men in its brotherhood."

"Are you never coming to lunch?" broke in Donald at this point. "We are waiting, Aunt Dora and I, and I am as hungry as a bear. Come on."

This was so unlike the Donald of the old time—not very far off, either—that they all laughed heartily, and Dudley said, "Country air must have a good effect on you, my little boy, to make you feel like that."

"I wonder what Squire Danforth and Miss Marian are eating to-day," said George. "Wouldn't you like to be in Mexico for a little while to taste the fresh oranges and bananas, Donald?"

"Yes, I would like to be there a little while, but I would rather have my home in a country where there is snow. I love to see the snow and to hear the sleigh-bells jingle."

"Yes," said Dudley, "and I think you like to be seated in a sleigh behind the bells, don't you?"

He was answered by a merry laugh, full of life and spirits.

The next morning, to Donald's joy, brought a heavy snowstorm. Indeed, it had been snowing most of the night, and the trees and shrubbery were all bending under a load of purest white.

"You can't see anything like this in New York, can you, Donald?" said George.

"No, indeed, George, not unless we go to the park; but here we have it all to ourselves."

"It stays white here, too, doesn't it, George? But I do wish the folks would get up, for I am awfully hungry."

Presently the last stragglers were gathered in for breakfast and Donald's hunger was appeased.

Two or three hours after breakfast, the snow ceased falling, and the sun shone brightly. Suddenly there was a sound of sleigh-bells, and Elsie came in to say that Jack Green was at the door with a great sleigh, in which he wished to take the entire family to ride.

The proprietor of the hotel had promised Jack, in return for some service which he had rendered, that he should have the best turnout in his stable for a whole day, should there be enough snow for sleighing, before the season closed. Jack was jubilant, when he arose that morning, to find the ground covered, with the snow still falling. This would be a grand opportunity to show his gratitude for past favors, he thought; so off he hurried, as soon as his early breakfast was over, to see about his "rig" before it was engaged elsewhere. It was evident, from the manner of the proprietor, that he had not been expecting to be called upon to fulfil his pledge so late in the season, but there was no idea in Jack's mind of allowing him to break his promise. Neither would he be put off with a common sleigh. The best turnout in the stable, with ample seats and warm rugs, was the only one that Jack would accept.

"It will come mighty unhandy to me to have that rig out, if a party should be gotten up to-day," grumbled the proprietor.

"I reckon 'twould, Mr. Bunch, but you know a bargain's a bargain. I did the square thing by you, and now I want you to do the same by me. I want to take a party out to-day, a party of my friends."

Silas Bunch gave a sly laugh, as Jack spoke of his "friends," and wondered what the kind of sleigh mattered for the folks that Jack would probably take out.

When Jack explained the circumstances, Mrs. Hunter, although a little uneasy about the exposure in an open sleigh for herself and Donald, decided that they must accept his invitation or else his feelings would be wounded.

"I will wrap you both up well, Aunt Dora," said Lily, "and you will enjoy the ride. Then Jack can leave us at Aunt Phœbe's in time for her twelve-o'clock dinner."

Some moments were consumed in preparations for their unexpected excursion, but presently Donald was ready, and he ran to the door in a tremor of delight, to be hailed joyously by Jack, who said, "You don't often see such a team of horses as these, young man, even in New York City, do you, now? Ain't they beauties?"

"Oh, yes; and how they hold up their heads! They are both as black as coal."

"Wait until you see them on a canter, with the bells playing a tune for them to dance to; then you will see!" cried Jack.

As they rode along, George remarked:

"I say, Jack, can you take us over this afternoon and make us acquainted with your wife? Dr. Verner and I are interested in you and would like to become acquainted with her, too."

"Is that so?" he said. "Wal, Betsy'll be powerful glad to see ye. She don't often see a strange face. As soon as I leave you at Mrs. Langdon's, I am going over to give the little shavers a sleigh-ride, and I'll tell Betsy you're coming."

Donald was in a fever of delight; he had never had a sleigh-ride quite equal to this one; the long drive through the old forest trees and the merry family party on the way to the home all combined to make him perfectly happy. The whole party enjoyed the ride and were sorry when the end came at twelve o'clock, and they drew up with a great flourish at the door of "Paradise."

Divested of their wrappings, they were soon seated before the ample fire-place in the cosy parlor.

"Well, Mrs. Langdon, we visit you again in a storm," said Dudley; "but this time we were not driven in by the fear of a thunderstorm. Didn't Jack bring us in fine style?"

"Yes, Jack is a happy man to-day. I never saw him in such spirits, but I think it is partly due to the news in a letter he brought to me from the travelers early this morning. They expect to sail for home in April. The letter is not very long, but I suppose Marian is busy sight-seeing, and is keeping most of her news to give me when she gets home."

"Do you expect that they will remain at home when they come?" asked Mrs. Hunter.

"No, not for long. Marian hints of a probable visit to Europe again. I cannot think why the Squire wants to run around the world so. I am very sure I will not go again. The memories of the seasickness and the dangers we passed through are perfectly harrowing. With you living so near, I will abide joyfully at home. To this I have made up my mind, although I hardly think James will ask me to go."

Mrs. Hunter felt sure he would not, from what Marian had told her of the way she worried them on their last journey, but she did not need to make any comments, for just then Louise came to announce dinner.

A Reader's Voluntary Tribute

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I have just mailed a money order for three "renewals" to your office. The friend who was to mail them for me could not wait for me to add the following justly deserved tribute, so I write it in this note. Some of the words I would use in describing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are: interesting, instructive, benevolent, cosmopolitan, patriotic, trustworthy, and truly evangelical. It is a blessing to individuals and to the home. Its premiums are choice and valuable. During 1908 "The Course in Esperanto," by Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts, was a very great help to me, for which I thank her and THE HERALD.

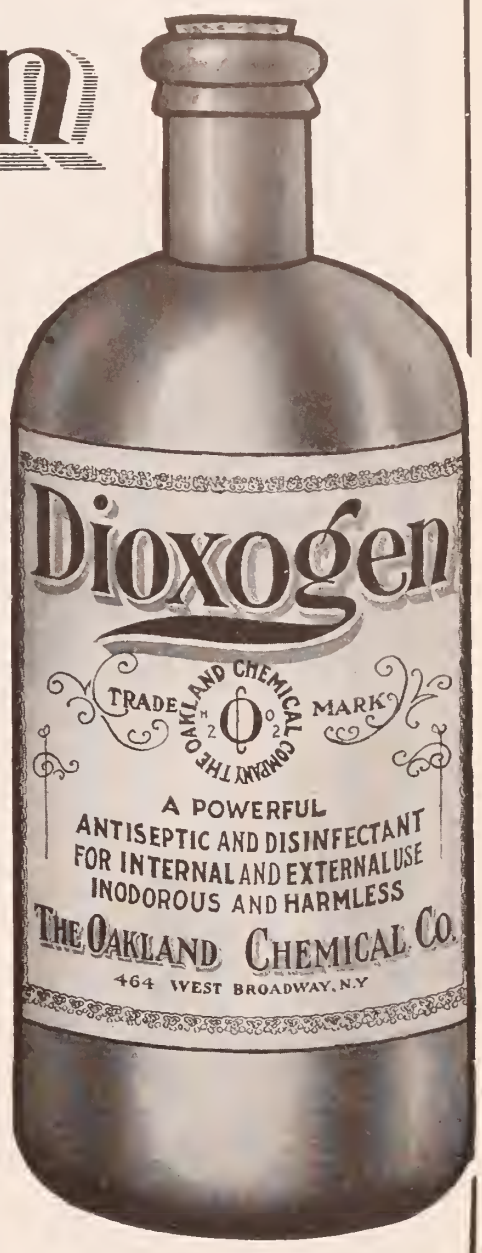
Dioxogen

Produces the Aseptic Cleanliness Which Prevents and Eliminates Infection



ASEPTIC CLEANLINESS is the condition most sought for in modern sick room, hospital and surgical management because it has become universal knowledge that such cleanliness immeasurably reduces the danger and loss from injuries and operations. Public schools, benevolent societies and publications of national influence have joined with Health Authorities in teaching everybody not only the general benefits to society, but the personal advantages of aseptic cleanliness on the part of each individual.

Dioxogen, when used by the individual at home or in every day life, produces the sought-for aseptic cleanliness that prevents infection, that keeps common injuries from becoming serious, that wards off disease.

Dioxogen is safe. It contains only one active ingredient—Oxygen—the active cleansing agent in the air which we breathe. This oxygen can be actually separated, weighed and measured.

Dioxogen is harmless, because it consists of only oxygen and plain water. It can be left around the home. A child can use it.

Dioxogen is effective. It is as powerful an antiseptic as Bichloride of Mercury 1-1000.

Dioxogen works in the open. You can see and feel it work. It foams when it comes in contact with decaying substances, disease germs, and disease poisons. The oxygen causes the foaming, not only changing the nature of such products into harmless substances, but detaching and removing them from the places to which they adhere.

TESTS

Rinse the mouth repeatedly with diluted Dioxogen and note how it foams less and less as the tissues become aseptically cleaner and cleaner. Make similar tests in cuts, wounds, sores and wherever the skin is broken and inflamed.

Dioxogen Does Not Contain Acetanilid

Peroxide of Hydrogen is one of the most widely used and discussed articles of modern times. In its purest form, it has come into universal demand as a hygienic, antiseptic cleanser for producing personal aseptic cleanliness. In its impure and technical forms, it is an article of general commercial use, for bleaching cotton, fur, silks, etc. Very little care is required in the manufacture of it for these technical uses. Acids and other chemicals of a highly objectionable nature, are often found in such bleaching solutions, making them wholly unfit and dangerous for personal use. Such impure, low grade and bleaching peroxide of hydrogen, usually contains acetanilid to keep it from spoiling.

The purest peroxide of hydrogen that can be made is sold only in bottles bearing the trade mark name DIOXOGEN. This name DIOXOGEN is a protection to the public against unknowingly purchasing, for personal use, peroxide of hydrogen of impure and undesirable grades. It is protection against peroxide of hydrogen containing acetanilid. It is a guarantee of the purest, highest, unchangeable quality of peroxide of hydrogen that can be made for personal use.

If your druggist does not handle DIOXOGEN, send us his name and address, including the coupon at the left, and we will forward you, prepaid, a full two-ounce bottle of Dioxogen free, and direct you to stores within easy reach, where real Dioxogen is sold.

Questions and Answers

C. C. L., Washington, D. C. What caused the earthquake in Italy?

It is supposed that the gradual cooling of the earth's crust caused contraction in certain parts, and the quake was "a land slip," caused by the effort of the earth to readjust itself to the new conditions.

L. E. C., Hagaman, N. Y. What is the largest church building in the world, and what is the largest in the United States?

The largest church in the world is St. Peter's Cathedral, in Rome. It is in the form of a Latin cross. The total length of the interior is 612½ feet, the transept is 446½ feet, the nave is 152½ feet high. The dome, from pavement to top of the cross, is 448 feet. The cupola is 193 feet in diameter. The largest bell weighs 18,600 pounds, without hammer or clapper. The foundation of St. Peter's was laid in 1450 A.D., but was not well along toward completion until 1626, when it was dedicated. It was finished in 1880. The cost was probably about seventy million dollars. In America, the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, will probably rank as the largest church when completed.

O. H. L., Barre, Mass. What church does the Taft family attend?

The Taft family attends the Protestant Episcopal Church. You should send full name and address when sending questions to the MAIL-BAG.

Reader, Westerly, R. I. 1. Who is president of Yale College? 2. Who is the commander of the World's Salvation Army? 3. Was Frances Willard the first national president of the W. C. T. U.? 4. Was Margaret Bottome the founder of the King's Daughters, and is she still living?

1. Arthur Twining Hadley is president of Yale University. He was professor of political economy, and elected president June 29, 1899. 2. Rev. William Booth founded the Salvation Army in 1878. It grew from the Christian Mission, which he had previously founded. He is still its head, with the title of general and commander-in-chief. 3. No; Miss Willard was first the secretary, in 1874, and later became president of the organization, in 1879. 4. Yes; Mrs. Bottome was the founder of the King's Daughters. She died several years ago.

W. R., Lake Odessa, Mich. Explain Isa. 20:3, 4.

Isaiah's action, the leading commentators hold, did not continue uninterruptedly during the three years, but at intervals, to keep his object before the people's remembrance. With later prophets, such as Jeremiah and Ezekiel, such acts were common, though in some cases they may have been performed not literally, but in prophetic vision.

A correspondent in Brighton, Colo., and another in Pittsburg, Pa., have written to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD regarding the statement which appeared in our issue of March 3, in the concluding paragraph of the article entitled "A Young Sixteenth Century Martyr." In that statement certain expressions were attributed to a Philadelphia pastor, who (as quoted in certain papers at the time) justified the extreme punishment of so-called heretics. We are assured by our correspondents that no such statement was ever made and that the published accounts were denied by the pastor in question, whose name, however, we do not know. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is always glad to present the actual facts in the case, and in the present instance, where their presentation removes the ugly stigma of bigotry, we are more than pleased to know that the original reports, though widely circulated, had no real foundation.

J. I. D., Greenville, Pa. What is the meaning of the "Manchu Dynasty," in relation to the government of China?

The present royal family was established by the rulers of Manchuria, at the north of China proper. These were the Manchu Tartars, who overran the country in 1616-44. The dynasty then established is sometimes known as the Tsin dynasty. The Manchus, who came in, aside from the royal house, have mingled for the most part with the Chinese population. The royal house itself is not regarded as foreign by the mass of the population, with the exception of revolutionists.

J. W. S., Hull, Ill. 1. Would it be right for members of one denomination to disregard the doctrines and practices of their denomination in order to be able to work with another denomination, which was practicing what they did not believe to be Scriptural or taught in the Bible? 2. Was Simon Magus' belief a saving belief?

1. We believe that you should stick to your denomination. There is no Protestant denomination at the present day which has not, in addition to the essential of the Christian faith, certain methods of its own to which its followers adhere. A rolling stone gathers no moss, and this is as true of church relations as of business. 2. Apparently not. Simon Magus was attracted by the wonderful miracles wrought by the apostles and he became their disciple and was baptized, but his object was apparently to learn their spiritual power and make money out of it. That he was not sincere is shown by Peter's denunciation (Acts 8:9-24). Early Church historians write that he gave the apostles much trouble afterward, but in every encounter was signally defeated.

Apropos of the popular movement against the slaughter of birds of song for the ornamentation of women's hats, Miss Esma G. Denby, Brandsville, Mo., sends us some very pretty verses, in which she bemoans the fate of the feathered songsters:

Shall merry voice be silenced,
And wings in death droop low,
And spots of blood stain tiny breasts,
As white as driven snow?

God speed the time when womankind
Shall say, with throbbing breast,
"No more God's creatures I will slay,
No more their joys molest."

R. B., Breckenridge, Mich. Can a person be a true Christian and a hypnotist?

We see no reason why hypnotic power, which is simply animal magnetism or mesmerism, should not be possessed by any one. In the hands of a wicked person it might easily be used for wrong purposes, while a good person might make excellent use of it, as has been illustrated in the case of Dr. Worcester, of Boston, and several others.

Leaders in a "Liberal" Religious Movement

A NEW religious movement has been started in Philadelphia by ministers of various denominations, having for its avowed object the removal of creed and denominational barriers, and the establishment of a forum where men and women of all creeds can meet on common ground and discuss matters pertaining to religion without regard to church or denominational differences. Just where this movement will lead, it is difficult to say; but those engaged in it are certainly earnest and sincere. The group above, forming the committee that is promoting the idea of abolishing religious barriers, is composed of—reading from left to right—Top row: Mr. Spicer, Quaker; Rev. L. G. Batman, Church of Disciples; Mr. Dowson, Quaker; Rev. George H. Ferris, D.D., Baptist. Lower row: Rev. Joseph Krauskop, D.D., Hebrew; Rev. Henry Wilbur, Quaker, and Rev. J. Clarence Lee, D.D.

LESS MEAT

Advice of Family Physician.

Formerly people thought meat necessary for strength and muscular vigor.

The man who worked hard was supposed to require meat two or three times a day. Science has found out differently.

It is now a common thing for the family physician to order less meat, as in the following letter from a N. Y. man.

"I had suffered for years with dyspepsia and nervousness. My physician advised me to eat less meat and greasy foods generally. I tried several things to take the place of my usual breakfast of chops, fried potatoes, etc., but got no relief until I tried Grape-Nuts food.

"After using Grape-Nuts for the cereal part of my meals for two years, I am now a well man. Grape-Nuts benefited my health far more than the $500.00 worth of medicine I had taken before.

"My wife and children are healthier than they had been for years, and we are a very happy family, largely due to Grape-Nuts.

"We have been so much benefited by Grape-Nuts that it would be ungrateful not to acknowledge it."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Subscriber, Bethlehem, Pa. How many years make a generation?

A generation is the average lifetime of people; it is usually estimated as one-third of a century, or thirty-three and a third years.

S. W. R., Middletown, N. Y. President Roosevelt has the credit of peacemaker between the Russians and Japanese, after the war was over. Will you please inform me in what way he was instrumental; did he interfere in their settlements?

President Roosevelt invited the Russians and Japanese to agree to a truce while terms of peace could be discussed on neutral ground. Mr. Roosevelt saw that he was the only one who could make such an offer with any chance of acceptance, as the other powers were supposed to be interested in the victory of one or the other combatants. He first met the envoys at Oyster Bay, and they then adjourned to Portsmouth, N. H., where a treaty of peace was signed. For this President Roosevelt received the Alfred Nobel Peace Prize from Sweden. He used his good offices whenever possible to stop the war.

M. G. F., Rutherford, N. J. In your issue of the 3d inst., which deals with President Taft's "Most Important Task," I do not see any one taking note of the infamous 'white slave" traffic, which has attained such huge proportions and is bringing misery and death to so many innocent victims. It is a burning shame that such an infamous traffic should be allowed.

We quite agree with you that the traffic is a disgrace and should be stopped; but it seems to us to be the duty of the State, rather than the national authority. If the proper officials in the States affected would do their duty, much good might be accomplished.

A. N., Roosevelt, Utah. Is it true that living human beings are sometimes used in making rubber? If true, it ought to be more generally known than it seems to be.

No human beings have ever been used to manufacture rubber. You probably refer to the fact that the statement is made that "rubber costs thousands of lives." In Africa the natives have been compelled to turn in a certain amount of rubber, and when they could not get enough to satisfy the officials they have been either mutilated or killed. Efforts are now being made to stop the horrors of the rubber trade in Africa. It has almost become an international question between Belgium, which controls the rubber districts, and other countries.

Mrs. J. Y. S., Eden, Md. "The laborer is worthy of his hire," and certainly the pastor should be properly sustained by his people. It is a duty which none should seek to evade.

Miss A. B., Bristol, Ind. The first passage is a warning to Christians against marrying unbelievers. The second is a declaration that husbands and wives should live harmoniously, and that they should not be parted.

A. H. H., Pittsburg, Pa. All official deliberative bodies held in civilized lands to-day are formally opened by prayer, and we have no doubt that the Hague Conference was not an exception.

Mrs. L. T. P., Sanford, Fla. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Italian Earthquake Fund has closed. We have already forwarded a considerable amount of money to Queen Helena's Fund for the widowed mothers and babies, and also for the suffering Waldenses in Sicily and Calabria.

G. T. S., Millbrook, N. C. It may be accepted as certain that, whatever may have been the nature of the wine Christ made at Cana, it had nothing harmful in it—nothing that would unseat the reason or make brutes of men. It was probably the fresh juice of the grape.

N. O. S., Evansville, Ind. There is such a thing as Christian Socialism, and it is probably best illustrated by the Fabians, who believed in education, agitation and legislation, but never in violence. Anarchy is the other extreme swing of the pendulum, and aims at the subversion of all law and order.

E. G., Gilman, Ill. 1. We never heard of them. 2. It means that the Christian or believer is under grace and no longer under law. We are not entitled to infer, from Paul's silence concerning any particular sin, that he approves of that sin. There are many causes of obscurity in dealing with Oriental languages. Some passages are poetical or allegorical, and in no sense to be taken literally. The best authorities should be consulted before reaching a conclusion on any disputed passage.

A SUNDAY SCHOOL VETERAN

A FEW weeks ago, Mr. George H. Corfield, of Jersey City, resigned as a teacher in the Bergen Baptist Sunday School of that city, after an unusually long period of service covering the greater part of a lifetime. Mr. Corfield's experience in Sunday School work is a most interesting one. He says:

"My Sunday School experience began at the age of five, in the old Court House Sunday School in Astoria, L. I., in the year 1848, when I was introduced as a member of the so-called 'infant class.' This was a Mission School, and conducted in the primitive methods of that day. The enlistment for service at that time continued unremittingly through many changes of location incident to removals to various places of abode, until May, 1873, when called to service as a teacher of an adult class in the Bergen Baptist Sunday School, of Jersey City, then under the direction of W. H. Sutton, superintendent.

Mr. George H. Corfield

"On February 24, 1884, I was promoted to the Primary Department, and have continued in charge of this particular corner of the Master's vineyard until the present date, being the only laborer who has been privileged to occupy one distinctive position for a period of nearly thirty-six years, during the fifty years' history of the Bergen Baptist Church.

"Among the pleasantest and most profitable of all my Sunday School experiences are the ineffaceable impressions associated with the Fourth World's Sunday School Convention, held in old Jerusalem, April, 1904, to which I was an accredited delegate from New Jersey.

"It has been my great joy and privilege to serve, as has also been the case with those of my inner circle of acquaintances, in church activities whose fellowship I recall as among my choicest recollections. These associations have been a benediction to me during these sixty-one years.

"I have been glad during the years that add up a lifetime, and am glad to-day because 'There hath not failed one word of all His good promise which he promised.' If it be true that the Church is the hope of the world and the Sunday School is the hope of the Church, then by parity of reasoning the Primary Department is the hope of the Sunday School."

Mr. Corfield, despite his years, is still full of spiritual zeal and is active in church work. His interest in the Sunday School will continue while life lasts and the memory of the young souls he has helped will be with him always.

PETER AND CORNELIUS

By Mrs M. Baxter

THERE was a centurion of Cæsarea, a Gentile, who was seeking after God. Already he feared God, with all his house; he was liberal in almsgiving, and conscientious in everything, but yet unsaved. There are such to be found—men upright in their lives, having the greatest respect for God, most conscientious, men whose lives no man can blame, and who nevertheless are unsaved, who pray but receive few direct answers, their words and deeds irreproachable, and yet they are still unsaved, still unable to rejoice in sins forgiven.

But one day, while he was in prayer, quite unexpectedly to him, God sent him a message by an angel. Startled and afraid he cried, "What is it, Lord?" And the messenger of God told him how his prayers and alms were "come up for a memorial before God." But he must send men to Joppa to seek Peter, who should tell him words whereby he and all his house should be saved. No sooner had Cornelius found out there was something for him to learn, than he made it known to two of his servants and one of his soldiers, telling them of God's revelation; and he trusted them to be his messengers to Peter.

Meanwhile God was preparing Peter. He was in prayer, and became hungry, and God sent him the vision of a great sheet, knit at the four corners, containing all kinds of four-footed beasts, wild beasts and creeping things. Peter could not of himself discern His meaning. While thinking about it, the messengers from Cornelius came and inquired for him. It did not take Peter long to discover that they were Gentiles, and sent to him by a Gentile seeking salvation. Up to this time, Peter had looked upon salvation as the exclusive right of the Jews. But once fully persuaded that it was the will of God that Gentiles should be saved, he went fearlessly forward; the barrier of prejudice was broken down; he was at the disposal of the Holy Ghost. He lodged the men from Cæsarea, and on the morrow went with them.

Meanwhile Cornelius called together his kinsmen and friends. It is probable that he had spoken with them before about his convictions that the God whom the Jews worshiped was the true God; and there may, in this way, have been a preparation for the visit of Peter. When Peter met Cornelius, he immediately forbade any honor of himself, and then told out frankly the lesson which God had been teaching him.

With such an audience as that in Cornelius' house, with such a preacher as Peter, full of his new lesson, no wonder the whole company was filled with the Holy Ghost! Peter's first words in preaching were to recognize "that God is no respecter of persons." This truth was just what the Gentiles wanted as a ground on which to go forward, for, if the Jews were the only elect, then the seeking after God on their part was lost time. Then Peter began to speak of his Lord: "The Word which God sent . . . preaching peace by Jesus Christ." This was his message—Jesus; Jesus anointed, Jesus healing, and then Jesus slain, Jesus risen, Jesus the Judge of quick and dead. As Peter spoke of Jesus "ordained of God to be the Judge of quick and dead," the strangers, with the light of eternal life and eternal death just breaking in upon them, must have felt themselves in a perilous position. But the preacher went on: "To Him give all the prophets witness, that through His name, whosoever believeth in Him shall receive remission of sins." Here was what they wanted. Would they believe and be saved? Blessed be God, there was instant decision on the part of every soul present—men, women, children, servants, soldiers. "While Peter yet spake these words the Holy Ghost fell on all them which heard the Word." They believed, and they were baptized.

Your Way

You bake in a dry-heat oven. The top beans crisp, but the beans below never get half enough heat.

So your beans don't digest; they ferment and form gas. They are mushy and broken, while every bean should be whole.

The tomato sauce isn't baked in.

The dish is not very inviting. It is heavy and hard to digest. Your people don't want it often.

The result of your time and trouble has been to spoil Nature's choicest food. Yet it isn't your fault. You simply lack the facilities.

Our Way

We pay $2.25 per bushel to get the choicest beans grown—seven times what some beans cost.

We bake in steam ovens—in a heat of 245 degrees. We bake in small parcels, so the full heat goes through.

Thus all beans are baked alike—baked until they are mealy—baked so they all digest. Yet no beans are crisped, no beans are broken. The beans are nutty because they are whole.

We bake the tomato sauce in the beans and get our delicious blend. Then we send the dish to you all ready to serve.

Van Camp's BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE PORK AND BEANS

If you knew what you miss—what your people are missing—you would serve this delicious dish.

Beans are 84% nutriment. They contain more food value than the choicest beef, yet cost not a third as much. They should form a daily dish.

It is a pity to spoil such a food as this simply through lack of facilities. Learn what the difference is.

Three sizes: 10, 15 and 20 cents per can.

Annual Offer of Beautiful Ever-Blooming Roses

A RARE and Liberal Offer of Six Beautiful New Roses, including one of the most rapidly growing roses in existence—the Clothilde Soupert. All handsome, well-rooted, hardy plants. Last year's offer was accepted by thousands, and all were delighted. Your Homes and Gardens can be made more beautiful and fragrant than ever at no expense to speak of.

A small sum secures a wealth of Beauty and Fragrance which will last for months. The Rose is the most Popular Flower, and every family should grow them in profusion. This is the finest collection of Roses ever offered as a premium. We give brief descriptions as follows:

THE BRIDE. An Ivory-White Rose. This is undonbtedly the finest white rose ever offered to the public. None of them compare with The Bride in size and shape of buds and half expanded flowers.

STAR OF LYON. A Profusely Blooming Rose. This magnificent Tea Rose is a rich golden yellow; a strong, healthy and vigorous grower, immense bloomer, bearing flowers and buds early and late. The flowers are very deep, rich and full, excellent substance, very sweet.

SCARLET BEDDER. A Splendid Hardy Rose. It can be planted anywhere, being entirely hardy. Flowers are large size, fiery scarlet, a color rarely seen in Roses. Planted everywhere on account of its color and freedom of bloom. The size of the flowers and the brilliant coloring are marvelous, and it blooms all through the season in profusion.

CLOTHILDE SOUPERT. A Hardy Ever-Blooming Rose. In a single season small plants will grow fifteen to twenty-five feet, producing cluster after cluster of finest formed flowers. They are large, round and durable, and deliciously sweet. The color-effect is magnificent Ivory-White.

MAMAN COCHET. A Delightfully Fragrant Rose. The growth is vigorous, with rich, healthy foliage. The extra large flowers are produced on long stems, are very double, and the buds and half expanded flowers are simply exquisite in their graceful form, delicate color and rich fragrance. The color is deep rose-pink, the inner side of the petals silvery-gray.

THE BRIDESMAID. An Incomparable Rose. The most popular Pink Tea Rose. Thousands of this variety are grown every year for cut-flowers, and it is also very desirable for Summer bedding. It is a delightful shade of bright pink, very fine flowering and easily grown.

For Only 35 Cents we will send The Housewife all the rest of this year and the collection of 6 Fine Roses, as deseribed above.

THREE OTHER GRAND COLLECTIONS!

Six Superb Carnations

LADY BOUNTIFUL. A fine Carnation in size and form. We do not hesitate to recommend this variety as the best white yet introduced. The flowers are very large, borne on a stiff, strong stem; color a pure glistening white. One of the most fragrant Carnations we have.

MRS. FRANCIS JOOST. This has proved to be one of the most satisfactory and profitable Carnations introduced in years. Color a soft shade of pink. It is a strong, vigorous grower, and is generally recognized to be one of the most profitable Carnations.

WHITE ENCHANTRESS. This is a pure white sport of Enchantress, which is at once the most popular and most profitable Carnation grown today; and this on account of its size and stem and freedom with which it blooms. White Enchantress is identical in every respect but color. Those who desire quality as well as quantity will find it in White Enchantress.

AMERICA. (New.) A soft shade of scarlet. Habit, medium height, with a compact growth. A fine sized flower, well formed, nicely filled and not crowded with petals. Good calyx, and long, stiff stems. It is one of the early bloomers. Very free and easy of culture.

HARLOWARDEN. Very strong, free grower; extra long stems; large flower, of bright crimson with shadings of scarlet. Very free.

MISS MAUD MUELLER. Scarlet and white variegated. Will be one of the best Carnations for amateur culture, as it is easily grown, and not at all susceptible to the different Carnation diseases.

For Only 35 Cents we will send The Housewife all the rest of this year and the collection of 6 Superb Carnations, as described above.

Six Grand Chrysanthemums

BLACK BEAUTY. Color blood-red petals long and curiously curled; a wonderful variety, both in color and form. Both odd and beautiful.

GOLDEN WEDDING. The grandest, golden-yellow variety, and is the marvel of the period. Nothing can exceed the richness of its color. It is a remarkably vigorous grower, and has such strength of stem that it carries its great globular flowers erect, giving it a bold, majestic appearance.

SILVER WEDDING. This variety is of mammoth size, of robust habit, with magnificent foliage; purest snow-white in color; very broad, heavy, deep flower, measuring fourteen inches in diameter. When the flower is several days old the outer petals curl and interlace. Probably the largest of all whites, and no doubt the very best. This charming variety has taken prizes wherever shown.

MRS. COOMBES. An extra fine very early pink variety of the largest size. Color, beautiful rose pink. First-class pink Chrysanthemums are scarce, and this variety will prove exceedingly valuable on account of its earliness and large size.

ADELE. A new globular, incurved variety; a delicate pink and very early flowering, making it a good commercial sort; an easy grower, with a fine stem and foliage.

ESTELLE. Produces extra-sized flowers of the purest white; fine deep form; under the same conditions of culture it came a week earlier than its parent, Glory of the Pacific, with a far superior flower in shape and substance.

For Only 35 Cents we will send The Housewife all the rest of this year and the collection of 6 Grand Chrysanthemums, as described above.

Six Best Geraniums

FIREBRAND. Color dazzling flame scarlet; fine, prominent truss, flowers large and of great substance; an excellent bedder and pot plant. For planting in masses we have none to equal it. Another thing in its favor, it takes fewer plants because of its sturdy branching habit, to give effect.

HETERANTHE. A magnificent variety. Flowers bright red, trusses of enormous size and borne high above the foliage.

LA FAVORITE. The flowers are borne in large trusses of the purest snow-white, retain this pure whiteness even in the height of summer, and for winter blooming they are all that can be desired.

BEAUTE POITEVINE. One of the very finest of the Bruant race. The color is a brilliant salmon shading to apricot in the center; trusses colossal; florets two and one-fourth inches in diameter. Created a sensation at the Paris Exposition.

S. A. NUTT. This is the darkest and richest Double Geranium grown. It is a very bright, dark, deep, rich velvety-maroon, an excellent bedder and a perfect pot plant; one that must find its way into every collection. Always in bloom.

PINK BEAUTY. One of the most beautiful pink colored varieties, either for growing in pots or bedding out.

For Only 35 Cents we will send The Housewife all the rest of this year and the collection of 6 Best Geraniums, as described above.

What Subscribers Say:

"I CONSIDER the Editorial Outlook worth the whole year's subscription. It was an inspiration, and the whole magazine is elevating and uplifting. Whatever your subscription list numbers, it should certainly be doubled."

"YOU certainly publish one of the best magazines going. I take and exchange with my neighbors, so I have the reading of more than a dozen, and yours compares favorably with the best of them."

"YOUR editorials are the best I have ever read; they have been helpful to me and I have read them often in our Mothers' Meeting."

"WHILE I am renewing my subscription I can't but speak a word of praise for our dear, good paper. I did think once I would not take it this year, but when the time came for it to come and I had waited, it just seemed as if a friend has disappointed me."

"IT is an interesting paper: the editorials are uncommonly fine, calculated to do great good, and the stories are always practical and helpful."

"I HAVE received THE HOUSEWIFE and think it is just splendid. It is full of the very best reading, and the Editorial Outlook especially struck me as the finest thing I have read lately. We have mothers right around us that ought to read that editorial."

"PLEASE accept my praise for your magazine. I think it is one of the most entertaining monthly papers that I have ever come across, and within the reach of everyhody. It has more stories in it than many of the ten and fifteen-cent papers. Yon have so many lovely short stories that THE HOUSEWIFE is one of the most welcome visitors that come to our house."

THE HOUSEWIFE

is a First-Class Magazine, published exclusively in woman's interests. Like Magic Nothing else in cookery is so nearly magical as the preparation of JELL-O desserts. The process is so simple and quick that it is like the touch of a fairy's wand.

Delicious JELL-O Desserts

Can be made in a minute. There is no flavoring to be added, no sweetening to be done and no cooking is required. Nothing to be done that requires experience or practice. Anybody can prepare JELL-O desserts.

The Charm of It

Attractiveness of form and color and beauty of setting are important details of every dish that appears before the diner. The doctors tell us that a beautiful dessert aids digestion.

Beautiful JELL-O Desserts

No two of the seven different flavors of JELL-O make up into desserts of the same color. There is as much difference of opinion as to which is the most beautiful as to which is the most delicious—but entire unanimity in deciding that all have greater charm than anything else that comes to the table.

The Low Cost of It

There is no waste of time making JELL-O desserts.

No expenditure of energy.

No fussing over a hot stove.

They come almost as by a miracle.

Economical JELL-O Desserts

Another wonder of this wonderful preparation is the small cost. Ten Cents!

A JELL-O dessert that will serve six persons costs a dime.

The cent and a half gives each diner (and the cook) more satisfaction for the money than is ever likely to be derived in any other way.

The Purity of It

The base of JELL-O is crystal gelatine, delicate, white, translucent, and pure and clean as falling snow—combined with extra fine granulated sugar.

Pure JELL-O Desserts

The fruit elements and everything else that go to make up this delightful product are the choicest that can be procured, and they are added by the nicest of modern scientific processes. No food preparations could be purer or more wholesome.

The judges at the last three great National Expositions gave JELL-O highest award Gold Medals.

JELL-O flavors are: Strawberry, Lemon, Orange, Chocolate, Raspberry, Peach, Cherry.

Questions and Answers

J. H. M., Cumberland Gap, Tenn. Is it customary, in the Eastern States, for gentlemen to rise and give their seats to ladies, when the car is crowded? In some Western States they do not, and the ladies do not seem to expect it.

We rather surmise that our correspondent has been misinformed, or has come in contact with some rude company. It is customary everywbere for a well-bred man to give his seat to a woman, rather than see her stand in a car.

M. M. D., Dayton, O. What does Col. 2:8 mean?

It is a warning against those who would carry them away as their prey by making them adherents of some new, attractive, popular philosophy, which is not based on the eternal Word. To "spoil," in this connection, does not mean to make vain by flattery, by adulation or by giving one a wrong impression of one's importance, but to betray, mislead, capture, destroy. The American Revised Version gives the more accurate translation: "Take heed lest there shall be any one that maketh spoil of you."

Reader, Millersburg, O. Where can I obtain facts about Carmen Sylva?

Her real name is Elizabeth. She is the daughter of Prince Hermann of Wied Neuwied and Maria of Nassau, and was born December 29, 1843. She married Charles of Roumania, then prince, later king, in 1869. Her only child, a daughter, died in 1874. In her great sorrow she began to write under the penname you quote. She is much beloved.

M. A. S., Glover, Vt. I have been told by a chemist, who is a church member, that salt could not lose its savor, and asked to explain Matt. 5:13.

It was a belief of the Jews that salt would lose its virtue by exposure to the air. Pliny, the Roman writer, had the same idea. Moundrell asserts in his Early Travels that he found the surface of rock salt in this condition. We are unable to answer second query you sent.

A. E. P., Parks, Neb. Where did the belief in Purgatory originate?

It is an ancient doctrine, and was known long before it was taught by the Catholic Church. Orthodox Judaism holds it, although some eminent Jewish writers teach the annihilation of the wicked. Protestantism rejects the doctrine as one having no Biblical authority and because Christ brings a full and free pardon for the repentant sinner.

J. B., Dansville, N. Y. What is the present military strength of the leading nations of the world?

On a war footing the figures are as given below. The peace footing averages about four-fifths smaller:

Austria	2,234,000
Belgium	143,000
Bulgaria	205,000
Denmark	50,000
France	2,516,000
Great Britain	739,045
India	222,219
Germany	3,260,000
Greece	82,000
Holland	68,000
Italy	3,330,000
Japan	800,000
Mexico	146,500
Norway	80,000
Rumania	173,948
Russia	4,000,000
Spain	500,000
Sweden	570,000
Switzerland	526,105
Turkey	1,150,700
United States	188,286

G. A. C., Brantford, Ontario, Can. Is Mr. Roosevelt, or any man, justified in making an expedition of slaughter on innocent and unsuspecting animals?

Mr. Roosevelt goes to Africa, as he has explained, with a scientific object in view, as well as to hunt for game. We do not think that he takes any delight in their slaughter, nor do we believe that any man would be justified in indulging a bloodthirsty propensity for killing merely for the sake of the sport.

J. W. S., Stevens Point. Was the Atlantic liner Mauretania, "queen of the seas," built by the government? if not, who owns it?

No; the Mauretania was built by a private shipbuilding concern on the Clyde, in Scotland. She was built for and is owned by the Cunard Steamship Company.

Mrs. I. C., Walworth, N. Y. Have there been two of our Presidents that could not read or write? if so, what were their names?

No; all of the Presidents have been fairly well educated men when they took up the duties of their office.

F. J. P., Ft. Wayne, Ind. Have we an official international language? if so, what language is spoken?

Yes; by common consent, French is used as the official tongue for diplomatic intercourse and international Congresses, for the reason that French is more generally understood by the people of Europe than any other tongue. If a man knows one language besides his own, it is usually French.

The First Meeting of the New Cabinet, With President Taft in the Chair

FOLLOWING the inauguration, probably the most historic event in Washington was the first meeting of the President with his new cabinet. When the members came in they had no difficulty in finding out just where they were to sit at the council board of the nation for the next four years, for in the mahogany table were brass plates, each stating which Secretary was to make himself comfortable in its locality. Hardly had the cabinet members seated themselves and turned their chairs toward the President when a flashlight went off with a roar and four photographers had taken pictures of the group. The first meeting was devoted largely to discussing methods of procedure. It was decided that members should go personally to oversee first hand any business of their departments. Mr. Dickinson, the new Secretary of War, will go shortly to Panama for a short trip to keep in touch with canal matters. The Secretary of the Interior will investigate the preservation of our natural resources. In the picture, the gentleman in the foreground at the President's right is Secretary of State Knox.

I. J. P., Dawson, Ga. Explain I. Pet. 3:19. When did Christ preach to the spirits in prison, and does this show that those antediluvians had a second opportunity to be saved?

It is a difficult passage. Some of the best commentators hold that it refers to the preaching of Christ, through Noah, to his contemporaries before the Flood, by virtue of the Holy Spirit, and while they were yet in the prison-house of sin and the flesh.

J. B. W., Santa Barbara, Calif. What is the approximate number of martyrs from the first to this date?

No accurate estimate can be formed of the "innumerable company" of those who have perished for the Christian faith. It has been a subject of great controversy, and many volumes have been written about it. In Greece, Rome, Egypt, Britain, the Continent, the islands of the sea, Africa, Asia, and almost every land under the sun there is a martyr roll. Read in some good encyclopedia the articles on Roman persecution, the Inquisition in Europe, the Covenanters, the Inquisition in Mexico, the early Christian martyrs under Nero, and the martyred missionaries in modern times. Read also Guizot, Ruinart and Gibbon on the same subject.

L. L., West Granville, N. Y. Will you kindly inform me how to pronounce "Wallachian"?

Its pronunciation is given in the New International Dictionary as Wal-la-ki-an; sometimes the sound of v is given to the w.

A. W., Westminster, Md. 1. Give in order the five first naval powers, in order of their strength. 2. Give number of battleships they have. 3. Give number of men under arms.

1. Great Britain, United States, Germany, Japan, France. 2. Great Britain has 55 battleships, United States 25, Germany 24, France 25, Japan 14. 3. On naval service: officers and men, Great Britain 99,679, United States 47,750, Germany 33,500, Japan 36,480, France 25,500.

F. G. M., Corvallis, Ore. Reading Rev. 1:3 and 22:10, last clause, "For the time is at hand," this thought arises: We are somewhere along in the fulfilment of the Revelation, but where? Are we past the middle or not? Are we nearing the end? What is the middle? What is the end? What is the belief of our ablest writers and commentators on these points?

Professor Weiss holds that this must not be regarded as prediction in its narrowest sense, but as an admonition connected with the preceding promise. The same phraseology in 22:10 is clearly intended to be taken in conjunction with the admonition. In other words, it may be interpreted as meaning: "Be converted now in your short time, before I come, else you must remain unconverted forever." Commentators differ, however, and there are not a few who hold that it means simply that the time for the fulfilment of the prophecy of Christ's coming is at hand. A new and helpful little volume on Revelation is published by Rev. J. M. Knappenberger, Syracuse, N. Y., which might aid you.

M. B., Toledo, O. What may we regard as the advantages to the country of the recent cruise of our warships in the Pacific?

They have been very clearly pointed out by Admiral Sperry, viz.: 1. The gunnery efficiency has been improved 50 per cent. 2. The crews of the warsbips have been made thoroughly efficient, and are worth double what they were when they started for all service purposes. 3. Our diplomatic and commercial relations in the East have been strengthened and substantially improved. 4. Respect for the American Navy and the American flag has been greatly increased throughout the world.

C. H. A., Vienna, N. J. 1. How much out of place was the surface of the earth moved by the recent earthquake in Italy? 2. Was the betrayal of Christ necessary for his identification, or was it in fulfilment of Scripture?

1. During the shocks the surface probably moved back and forward, horizontally, several inches, but perpendicularly it lifted much more. Under the water in the straits it has apparently risen many feet and the water along the shore is shallower. In some places the coast line has fallen several feet. Full reports and measurements have not yet been made by scientific investigators. 2. It was clearly in fulfilment of Scripture.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. F. M. H., Pittsburg, Pa. Submit your question to some professor of physics, or a competent engineer.

Mrs. C. B., Michigan City, Ind. He was Judas of Kerioth, a small village near Jerusalem. He was related to Simon (see John 6:71).

D. W., Hillsboro, O. The Bible which Mr. Taft selected is one which has been used in the Supreme Court for nearly a century. It is the King James Authorized Version.

A. L. N., Ransom, Pa. Write to Biglow & Main, music publishers, New York City; Oliver Ditson Company, Boston, Mass. You should have sent full name.

J. L., Sharon, Pa. The incidents you have described have been a cause of much dispute. One thing is certain, however, viz., that whatever Lot's moral character may have been, it was far superior to that of those around him.

B. W. Y., New Brunswick, N. J. We have heard the suggestion that the mild weather along our sea coast this winter was caused by the Gulf Stream running farther inshore, but there has as yet been no scientific verification of the report.

Many of our friends are sending in, with the renewals of their subscriptions, some very kind letters. Mrs. Rhoda A. Yorks, Neshanic Station, N. J., writes: "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is received in our family each week, and we consider it a great factor in brightening the lives and filling the minds of its readers with pure and wholesome thoughts."

Miss M. L., Shattuck, Minn. "Hades" is the Greek for the unseen world. This expression found its place in the Apostles' Creed about the fourth century. It did not appear in the earlier forms of the Creed, but since that time it has been used in the Creed by the Catholics and the Anglican Episcopal Churches. Some churches do not use it; they simply omit that sentence. Hades is the world of spirits, the unseen world.

Mrs. L. M. B., Sheridan, Calif. The sale of white slaves at auction, to which you refer, was somewhat misleading. They were unemployed men who, rather than remain idle, hired their labor out at auction at what it would bring. It was in no sense a sale of their bodies into slavery; such a thing can never again occur in this country. It was simply a novel method adopted to advertise their unemployment and need.

TRANSFORMED BY THE GOSPEL

By MISSIONARY B. O. PETERSEN

Vigan, Ilocos Sur, Philippines

SOME months ago we received $20, being a gift from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for our work. The money was immediately used in part payment of a horse, purchased for one of our Filipino preachers. It has been my intention to write you sooner concerning the disposal of this gift, but I put it off till such a time as I might have something definite to tell your readers concerning their beneficiary. The enclosed picture is of Severino Cordero as he appears on what we call "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD horse."

It would be impossible for Mr. Cordero to attend to the needs of his circuit without a horse. And so, indirectly, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD horse figures also in the work which Severino accomplishes. We have another useful man, whom we would like to put to that kind of work, but he is crippled for the want of a horse. Fifty dollars will provide a horse, saddled and bridled, for him.

Severino was converted four years ago. Belonging to the upper and official class of Filipinos, he was, previous to his conversion, addicted to every vice of the "principale." He has completely changed. An erring member of any one of the twenty or more congregations which he serves causes him the deepest unrest, until he has done all in his power to right the wrongdoer.

He believes profoundly in the Christian life, and lives it. He is not only a Filipino preacher of the first class, but a good pastor also. He preaches effectively the Gospel of Jesus, and of active personal work. He used to despise the American missionary for leading his horse out to graze, and for doing other things of a menial nature, which to the official class here is degrading. Now he shows by his life that all labor is holy. Formerly, he would not carry any sort of a burden with him when he traveled. Now he does not disdain riding into town with an armful of corn fodder or grass thrown across his horse's back, and he does many other acts of manual labor which those who were his former companions would never do. This new departure by one so widely known for his extreme prejudice against manual labor is having a wholesome influence on our other preachers and members. On account of some act committed during the time of the late revolution, Severino is still debarred from voting at the polls; but he is teaching the people to become good citizens and loyal "Americanistas."

Early last spring, Severino was calling at the house of a sick member, not far from Candon. The man was seemingly about to die, and was greatly worried because there was no food in the house for his wife and children. Severino tried to soothe the sufferer with truths from the Gospel; but with no food in the house the man could scarcely be pacified. Severino told him to trust in God for the welfare of his family, and that if he would place them in His care they would not suffer. Before leaving the house he prayed for the sick man and for the family, that God might send them help in their great need.

A neighbor woman was visiting at the house while Severino was there; but being an ardent Romanist, she was very much afraid of him. However, she heard what Severino told the sick man and how he prayed for God to provide. Within an hour, rice and other food was brought in abundance, but from what source was not disclosed. The neighbor was so overcome by this evidence of answered prayer that she began to make inquiries, with the result that she, too, was soon converted to the new faith. The fact that people brought help without receiving any news of need, except that they had a feeling that they ought to help the sick man in some way or other, was a powerful argument in winning this woman to the Gospel, since she could not answer without concluding that God had sent the help.

While conducting a service in Candon, in the month of May, I was much impressed by the peaceful expression on a certain woman's face in the audience. When the invitation was given to any who wished to confess Christ in baptism, this woman came forward, answering very clearly the questions put to her. When this woman learned of our Bible Institute to be held in Narvacan, November 1 to 14, she hastened the weaning of her youngest child in order that she might attend the school. The women's class was in the charge of Miss Elizabeth Parks, the California children's missionary. At the consecration service, held near the close of the school, this woman, with a number of others, volunteered for service. Two weeks after the close of the school, I received a letter forwarded to me, written by this woman to Severino, in which she stated that she had made provision for the proper care of her children; her husband had given her permission, and she was ready to go to Santa Cruz to teach the native women.

Some days ago, while passing by where she was working, I was told that many people, both men and women, are being converted through her teaching. The name of this devoted Christian woman is Nicomedes Rebolledo. She is poor and untaught in the wisdom of this world, but illustrates by her life how God reveals himself by power in the weak to confound the wisdom of the wise.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE HOME

TEXT: Ps. 84 : 3—"Even thine altars, O Lord of Hosts."

THE sweetest word in the English language is "home." Spurgeon said, "Home is the grandest of all institutions." Home is one of the relics of Paradise. It has had a place in all ages, and in all nationalities.

The words of the text were uttered by the Psalmist after he had been away from home and the altar of Jerusalem for a time. Although there were many places of beauty and delight that he was privileged to visit, none was so sacred to him as Mount Zion, the altar where he had been accustomed to worship. The home is the first in time of the great social institutions; first in the life of the individual, first in the life of the race. The origin of home goes back into the gray dawn of human history, when the Church and State were included in the household, when the housefather was teacher, priest and king.

Jesus Honored Home

The Saviour honored home; in his obedience to his parents, who ill understood his mission to the world; in his miracle at Cana of Galilee, and, above all, in the hospitality of the home of Bethany, where Jesus loved Mary and Martha and Lazarus. The symbolism of home pervades the teaching of the Master in the parable of the Prodigal Son, where we learn the true relation of the sinner to God, namely, that of sonship. Jesus taught devout worshipers, without priest or altar, to come straight to God and say, "Our Father." He lifted the veil that hid the mysteries of the future life and exhibited as a reward of the faithful, not the happy hunting ground of the red man, not the Paradise of the Moslem with its dark-eyed maidens, not the unending torment of the warrior, nor yet the solemn Sabbath of the mystic; but he showed us our heavenly home when he said, "In my Father's house are many mansions. I go to prepare a place for you." Take home out of music and literature and it would be like taking warmth out of the sunbeam, sweetness out of the rose, ripeness from the peach, the soul from the body, or God from the sky.

The Indian of a hundred years ago lived in a wigwam, and was no more than a savage. In the era of Plato and Pericles, the gods dwelt in palaces, while the people lived in mud huts. As we ascend the scale of civilization, we see the home changed into a palace, a place of beauty and refinement. Show me the kind of homes that go to make up a nation, and I will tell you something of the kind of government you may expect. Let me hear the talk at night around the fireside, and I can form some idea of the community. The school is based on the home, not the home on the school; as is the home, so is the school in the community. The highest form of government must be founded on the best kind of homes. Our government was founded on the old Puritan homes of New England.

When the philosophers affirmed that every sage, seer and statesman had had a great father or mother, they simply affirmed that the home is the source of civic power and wealth. When Wordsworth said that his parents made vows for him, he meant that there was a mysterious disposition toward love of nature and poetry. Augustine tells us that the tide that flowed down from his mother's life swept his soul forward upon his great career. Lincoln said, "All that I am, or hope to be, I owe to my mother." Thus the home becomes a temple and marriage becomes a sacrament, and we recognize what the child of to-morrow will be.

The Mother Influence

Among the most fascinating of recent books is the Mothers of Great Men, which shows Carlyle as only a spark struck out of his mother's genius; how Letitia lent energy, courage, decision and boundless ambition to her son, Napoleon; how that sweet German mother handed her harp forward to Mendelssohn; how, from their mothers, Luther had the love of liberty, and Richter his love for writing. The child becomes so saturated with the teachings and holy influences of his early home life that he never can cast them off. He may become reckless, and seemingly indifferent, for a time; but memory links him with his childhood days and their hallowed associations. Even in the midst of a wicked life, he finds himself at times carried back in memory to the glow of the old home altar, on which the fire never burned out, and to the midnight hour, when he again hears the music of his mother's voice and again is thrilled by her loving touch.

The story is told by a jailer, how, one evening before the lights were out in the prison and the convicts had gone from the corridor to their cells for the night, a strong, sweet baritone voice was heard singing in a rear cell:

> Gold has its powers, sages will say;
> Riches in life hold a wonderful sway;
> But there is a power hails from above,
> Richer and grander—the power of love.
> There strolls a noble—money and land,
> Lives in a mansion, costly and grand,
> Yet he's unhappy, no one knows why;
> Love's a power no money can buy.

The voice of the singer was choked for a moment; then, clearing his throat, as with an effort, he began the chorus:

> Love of a mother, for her darling child;
> Love for a son, though he's wayward and wild.

The account goes on to tell how audible sobs were heard both in the cell of the singer and from other parts of the corridors. Recollections of the mother-love had been stirred, and the floodgates of memory broken down. For a few moments it seemed as if some of them could not control their emotions; but finally all became still again, and the singer once more began:

> Love of a mother, for her darling child;
> Love for a son, though he's wayward and wild.
> Love that brings joy and tears to the eye,
> This love is something that money can't buy.

As the song ceased, those in the corridors rushed to the singer's cell and hands were thrust through the bars to clasp his hand in greeting. Nearly every prisoner avowed his purpose to lead a better life. And when "Home, Sweet Home" was sung they all joined with new hearts, because of the noble resolves of that good hour.

The primary seat of religion is not in the church, but in the home. When the hosts of Israel were encamped, the tent-doors of the families faced the tabernacle. It was an object-lesson in the promise of the covenant, "In thee shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." In the early days of Christianity the church was in the home. The pledge to Noah included his family with himself. The pledge to Abraham embraced his descendants. In the glad day of Pentecost, Peter affirmed that "the promise is to you and your children."

Enemies of the Home

A distinguished Brahman from India visited England, and was received everywhere with honor. Nobility banqueted him, royalty entertained him, crowds of intelligent people gathered to hear him speak; and, when he was about ready to leave, one of the most striking things he said was, "The greatest thing I have seen in England is the English home."

And so also with the American home. Yet one of our greatest authorities on social science has recently written: "The home, which has hitherto been the fundamental agent for fostering morality in the young, is just now in sad need of repair." American heiresses and foreign nobles exchange a fortune for a title, and a title for a fortune. The girl has money which she did not earn, and she wants a title which she has not. The noble has a title which, perhaps, he did not earn, and he wants a fortune which he has not. These two agree to supply each other's wants, and so they become man and wife. Publicity is given to the exchange; the minds of our youth are forced to consider wrong ideals of marriage; many are made to stumble, and the holy estate of matrimony is brought into disrepute. Better marry some one near your own station in life.

It frequently happens, too, that the home is brought into ridicule by the comic press and the pleasantry columns of the newspapers and magazines. "There is humor that maketh glad the heart of man; there is wit that makes his face shine, and there is satire and false cynicism that eat out the values of life." To laugh with the home is one thing; to laugh at it is another. A young generation is now being nourished on laughter at the home. Such a generation cannot bring to the future home a whole-hearted respect and devotion. Parents must have a care that nothing that defiles the home, or the thought of home, should enter into the minds of our youth, or, entering, that its influence should be offset.

The much-discussed divorce question is one of the serious dangers that threaten the homes of our country. The ease with which divorces are obtained, and the large number granted, have made a very dark cloud, which is now overhanging our nation. Then there is the business that takes father and mother both away from home, and children are left in the care of the dependants. Love for a child cannot be bought. Instead of teaching their sons how to vote, some mothers are striving to become voters themselves. This is not a blow at woman suffrage; but the greatest honor woman can have is to be queen in the home. How much better for her to keep the springs of the water of life pure in the home than to attempt to filter its muddy currents in the street!

The Home of Our Childhood

There is a fascination about the old home of our childhood. An old hero, wounded in life's battles and scarred in its conflicts, in his old age longed to be taken back to the home of his childhood. When he stood at last in that little village, what a change had passed over all familiar sights and scenes! The great farmhouse of his childhood had shrunk to a little cottage; something had narrowed the great river to a mere ribbon; the schoolhouse, once so vast and majestic, seemed like a rude hut. Some power had touched the mountains and made them tiny mounds. In that hour, with streaming eyes the old hero said, "This world is a bubble that has broken from me; this is not my home. My home is in heaven."

A few years ago, after having been away for some years, I went back to the home of my youth. As we stood and looked at the hills, we really concluded that the water had washed them down, and they were not so high as they used to be. And the creek that used to seem so big and deep was surely now filled up, for it was only a tiny brook, with a little water in it. Then, when I looked at the old church that used to seem so large to me, and when I thought of the long row of teams that used to stand at the hitch-rack, it all seemed so different. That night they had asked me to preach, and when we went into the church the seats did not seem nearly so long as they used to nor the room so large. As I entered the pulpit, and we went through the service, there was a solemnity about it that deeply impressed me. When I thought of the men of God who had prayed around that altar, and who in that very altar had knelt down beside me and prayed for me, and when I recalled how they talked to me and tried, in their humble way, to point me to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world, the place became very sacred to me.

The Heavenly Home

All the memories of the home that was, and all the dreams of the immortal home that is to be, are but foretokens of that fairer life we soon shall lead. The vague longings for ideal truth, the striving after music that eludes us, the groping for beauty we cannot find, the yearning for love and sympathy and satisfaction, oft denied us here, are God's ways of alluring us to the home that awaits us. Soon some of us, and, soon or late, all of us, shall meet God's messenger in the way. He may wear outwardly an iron mask, which hides from our eyes for a little space the face of a glorious angel of God. And he whispers this word, "I have a message for you from home. God wants you. Heaven asks for you. Welcome awaits you at home in heaven!"

NEW FACES IN THE SENATE

MARCH Fourth last was an inauguration day for twelve other men beside President Taft and Vice-President Sherman. Twelve new Senators, from as many different States, were sworn in by Vice-President Sherman as his first official act, just before Mr. Taft took the oath of office. The Senate is a continuous body, the terms of office lapsing at different periods, so that there are always more legislative veterans, in proportion to its numbers, than in the House, which is re-elected every two years. Even the new members of the Senate, almost without exception, are men of legislative experience, either promoted by their States from the House of Representatives after several terms, or else by service in various public departments they have secured a grasp of national affairs. This year we have Mr. Root, of New York, sworn in as Senator after acting as Secretary of State in President Roosevelt's Cabinet, and Senator Knox resigning from the Senate to take Mr. Root's place in President Taft's Cabinet. Several times Mr. Root has withdrawn from public life to re-enter the practice of law in New York City, but the call to Washington has been too strong for him to resist, and now that he has put on the toga it would seem that his future is settled for a long time to come and that the law offices on Liberty Street will know him no more as an active practitioner. Mr. Root by deciding to remain in public life gives up an income from his practice probably not exceeded by any lawyer in America. In fact, many of those who go to the Senate, as well as to the Cabinet, deliberately cut their incomes by many thousands. The honor of public service always seems a greater compensation than private gain.

South Carolina sends a young Senator, as Senators go, in Hon. Edward Durant Smith, who is only forty-three. Mr. Smith is not a lawyer, as are the majority of his colleagues. He is a planter, and was one of the organizers of the Farmers' Protective Alliance and has been active in the affairs of the Southern Cotton Association. Besides being a practical farmer and an extensive raiser of cotton, he has had much experience as a merchant. Another new Senator from the South is Hon. Duncan Upshaw Fletcher, of Florida. He was born in Georgia sixty years ago, but for years has been a resident of his adopted State. His interests are far from local. He is prominent in the movement for the conservation of our national resources. At the recent conference in Washington he was one of the prominent figures.

The West and Middle West have several new men in the Senate. One of them, Hon. Wesley L. Jones, of the State of Washington, has had twelve years of experience as a member of the House of Representatives. He has not made very many speeches in the lower house, but what he has had to say has been worth hearing. He is not a hothead, but a careful and painstaking legislator, and has little use for legislation that is jammed through in a hurry in such form that it has to be amended the next session.

From the Pacific slope comes also George E. Chamberlain, of Oregon. From Colorado comes Charles J. Hughes, of Denver. Senator Hughes has had much experience as a mining and irrigation lawyer, which will be valuable when bills covering these important subjects are under discussion. Both play a prominent part in the campaign for both the conservation and proper development of the country's resources.

Joseph L. Bristow, of Kansas, is another new Western Senator. Mr. Bristow, it will be remembered, was Fourth Assistant Postmaster under McKinley. He reorganized the Cuban postal service and investigated our own department. He is not a lawyer, but a newspaper man. Other new Senators are Theodore E. Burton, of Ohio; Coe I. Crawford, of South Dakota, and Martin N. Johnson, of North Dakota. The latter is a farmer, but has been a lawyer. William O'Connell Bradley, of Kentucky, is a Republican and one of the greatest orators of the South. He was the first Republican to be elected Governor of Kentucky. Benjamin F. Shively will represent Indiana as junior Senator. In place of Mr. Knox, Pennsylvania has elected Mr. Oliver, of Pittsburg, and Isaac Stephenson has just been elected by Wisconsin. Both took the oath about two weeks after the other new Senators had taken their seats, making fourteen new faces in that august law making body.

A NEWSPAPER FOR THE SOUL

TO take away from some men their morning paper would be like wrenching out their molars. Yet, after all, the best newspaper records, for the most part, things that are least important to us. Suppose a real newspaper could be published—one that dealt with the activities going on in the real life of the man, the "within you" of which Jesus spoke so much—what interesting reading it would be! Instead of taking a column to relate how John Smith had cornered the coffin market, and it would cost ten per cent. more to die, we should have headlines like this:

"A Hundred Unmedaled Heroes.

"Thomas Jones, a clerk in a dry goods store, broke all his previous records yesterday. He conscientiously refused to misrepresent some goods about which the manager bade him lie, and was given his time and told to take his hat and go, though he was on the list for promotion. Thomas left the store much more of a man than when he entered its employ. In the measurements of the Kingdom he is getting rich faster than his late employer, in the treasure that moth and rust cannot corrode, nor thieves break through and steal.

"For every hero whom the newspapers of material things notice because Carnegie gives a medal, there are a hundred whom the Recording Angel notices, because they have won some victory over self and the world."

It is a great pity that the battles of the inner life could not be recorded as fully as are those of carnage and sin. But the man who goes through existence with an eye upon his own inner life may have moments as proud as those of the privates whom Napoleon called from the ranks by the title "Captain," and decorated with the cross of the Legion of Honor. In the "within you," far more momentous deeds are being done than those recorded in the daily newspaper.

The chronicles of the "within you" are the "Lamb's Book of Life." There is going to be a great reading of the record one of these days, in which we shall all be more intensely interested than we were in the accounts by eye-witnesses of the siege of Port Arthur. We shall strain our ears to hear the news: "I was hungry and ye fed me, naked and ye clothed me, sick and in prison and ye visited me." What news it will be! What surprises! Why, when did this happen? We can't seem to remember anything about it. We were so taken up with the newspapers of the world, and their staring headlines and big reports, that we didn't take account of these trifles. We forgot that there was another reporter at our side getting news for the newspaper. And the only edition is about to be issued. Under the headlines of our Lord's "inasmuch" the only great news of your life is about to be published. How eagerly you will listen for the opening words: "As ye did it unto one——!"

The newspaper of the soul! Are we trying to get our names in it? The history of our soul lives—are we ready to have it published? Are we trying to get ready? Are we giving much attention to the events that are transpiring in the kingdom within us?

THE EARTH VIEWED FROM A BALLOON

Strawberry Hill, a Noted Suburb of London (Height, 700 Feet)

Children's Races at a Holiday Fete, Near London (Height, 1,200 Feet)

IT is given to few to be privileged to look down on this old earth from the clouds. We are told by those who have tried ballooning that the perils are mostly in the imagination of the individual who gazes at the big gas bag or the aeroplane as it soars skyward. But whether the danger be real or imaginary, the thought of coming down to death from such a stupendous height as it is possible to attain in a balloon has been sufficient to deter most persons from attempting a flight to the clouds.

The appearance of the earth from the height to which a balloon rises is a favorite topic with those who have made balloon ascensions. The actual sensation while ascending is said to be by no means startling. The balloon seems not to be moving at ail. But the constantly changing panorama below the basket, and the altogether novel view of the round world and its inhabitants from such an altitudinous situation, make up an experience that no balloonist can avoid becoming eloquent about.

With the aid of photography the earth's surface, as seen through the eyes of the balloonist, can now be brought within every one's ken. Photographs from a balloon that show the earth's surface in every detail, clearly and sharply defined, with people and houses and streets and trees plainly outlined, are a triumph of modern art. The houses—rabbit hutches as they seem in size—are seen in trim rows that are easily recognizable; the sharp line of the white highway, the narrower paths that lead around the houses, the tiny dots that are the inhabitants of this world, and the dark outline of the foliage, all stand out boldly and unmistakably.

The great difficulty in balloon photography is said to be the inability to get the pictures sharp. In those shown on this page the details are wonderfully clear. From a close study of these interesting photographs it is possible to gain a correct idea of the appearance of the world from the height to which a balloon rises, which is said to be one of the chief delights of aeronautics.

A CHRISTIAN COLONY IN THE HIMALAYAS

THERE is a place in India that stands as a perpetual memorial to the fact that God hears prayer. It is three miles from the border of the "sealed land" of Tibet, in the heart of the Himalaya Mountains. It contains three thousand acres of land, and is owned by the American Himalayan Christian Colony (undenominational), incorporated under the laws of the State of Illinois. Gorham Tufts is the founder and head of the colony.

This land was purchased through prayer, and is maintained and all its departments kept going by prayer. Yet they are not visionaries, these men and women who compose this colony of Christian missionary farmers. Nothing could be more practical than their plans and their manner of carrying them out. The work is divided into different departments, viz., training school, village work, orphanage and the industrial department. The last mentioned has several subdivisions and is considered to be of great importance. Dissatisfaction is often occasioned by the idleness and inefficiency of the Christianized natives of foreign lands. "What to do with the converts" has become a problem. The Himalayan colony has been enabled partially to solve this problem by putting its converts to work. "Labor is honorable and idleness a disgrace to any people," is the teaching given to both the adult converts and the children in the orphanage. The climatic and agricultural conditions are almost perfect. The soil is adapted to nearly all fruits, vegetables and grains. Already there are tea, sugar-cane, rice, wheat and barley under cultivation. Cattle, sheep and goats are be ing raised by the colony, and the dairy product find a ready market at the military stations. Mor buildings are needed, however, and the house fo the training school has yet to be completed. Agri cultural implements and tools of all sorts ar needed; mills (both saw and feed mills) have to b erected, and dairy outfits supplied. The worker are looking forward hopefull and prayerfully for thes things, which are essential t the progress of the work.

Mr. Tufts and his associate believe that native teachers ai destined to be an important ai in the evangelization of Indi They thoroughly understar the people; they know the la guage, are acclimated and ca be supported at little cost.

All the needs of the Chri tian Colony have thus far bee supplied by voluntary contr butions. It is purely a wo of faith. The superintender Gorham Tufts, Jr., and Charl T. Parnell, assistant superi tendent, are now in the Unit States. Any one interested this unique Christian expe ment in the far-off Himalay may address Mr. Parnell, 267 La Salle Avenue, Chicag Ill. He will gladly supply information desired.

A Baptismal Service Among the Natives of the Upper Himalayas

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—THE BIBLE Institute Colportage Association, of Chicago, recently celebrated the occasion of its publication of the one millionth copy of the Emphasized Gospel of John.

—EVANGELIST W. W. BENTLEY has just closed a series of very successful meetings at Mt. Vernon, O. Large congregations were in attendance, and many conversions are reported. His next field of labor is at New Lima, O.

—THE NEW YORK Christian Home for Intemperate Men last year received 442 men, of whom 285 were penniless. The Home farm proved a helpful industry and a means of revenue for the work.

—THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S Evangelistic Committee of the Presbyterian Church lately adopted a simultaneous rural evangelistic plan, and selected Tippecanoe County, Indiana, in which to hold initial meetings. They were held in various parts of the county by evangelists and pastors simultaneously, and were attended by excellent spiritual results, membership of the churches being largely increased.

—AT A MEETING OF the directors of the National Federation of Gospel Missions, held in the Bible House, New York, February 4, the following were elected as members of said Board: Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D., of New York; Rev. W. E. Biederwolf, D.D., of Kansas; Rev. C. P. O. Jones, Rome, Ga.; Miss Sara Wray, superintendent Eighth Avenue Mission, New York, N. Y., and Rev. A. P. Fitt, of Chicago, Ill. The annual convention of the Federation will be held in Jersey City, N. J., June 1 to 6.

—THE STEAMSHIP Mongolia, leaving San Francisco for the Orient February 16, carried some sixteen missionaries bound for China, Japan and Korea. Among these is the venerable Archdeacon Thomson, of Virginia, seventy-five years old, and now in his fiftieth year of service as a missionary in the Protestant Episcopal work in China. Mrs. Thomson said of her husband, "He would be heart-broken if he could not return." Rev. and Mrs. Robert T. Coit are also among the number and are on their way to Korea. Miss Baskerville goes as a trained nurse to China, and Mrs. J. V. Logan, of Danville, Ky., goes at her own expense to work in Korea.

—THE COUNCIL OF WOMEN for Home M sions is a new interdenominational organi tion, composed of nine representatives elec from each of the various women's home n sionary societies throughout the country. far eight denominations have united, others expect soon to elect representati The purpose of the Council is to provide r sion literature for interdenominational to arrange a service for a day of prayer to used by all denominations, to care for h mission interests in schools and colleges, in general to promote fellowship and co-op tion among women's mission boards and cieties. It is believed that the Council prove a valuable factor in broadening the look of home-mission women.

FOR A "UNIVERSITY OF HUMANITY"

General Booth Will Celebrate His Eightieth Birthday by Founding One for World Service

GENERAL WILLIAM BOOTH, founder, head and commander of the Salvation Army, will be eighty years old on April 10. The celebration of his birthday will be observed in fifty-four countries and colonies and in twenty-eight languages. There will be ceremonies to mark that day in Lapland, Alaska, New Zealand, New South Wales, Java and under the Equator.

Few people have any accurate conception of the true size and importance of the Salvation Army to-day. There are in the world 8,358 Salvation Army posts, 16,199 Salvation Army officers, and 20,808 musicians in its bands. The army steadily advances in every European country except Russia; it is perfectly organized throughout the East; in Egypt, India, Burma, Ceylon, Java, Sumatra, Australia, New Zealand, Polynesia, China and Japan the Salvation drum is heard, the Salvation flag flies and the Salvation cohorts, perfectly drilled and splendidly led, charge incessantly upon the strongholds of evil.

This great, world-wide enterprise William Booth has seen grow from one old tent, pitched in an abandoned graveyard in the forlornest region on earth; one old tent, with a box for a pulpit and a penniless man, unsupported and uncountenanced, standing there alone, preaching to a handful of the world's outcast, forty-four years ago; that was the origin of this movement which now encircles the globe. For sixty-five years William Booth has had no purpose in life except the saving of souls. With the utmost sincerity, he has believed that he, like John Wesley, was sent upon earth to rescue his fellows. The Salvation Army he has regarded as only a means to that end; a means peculiarly adapted to do work that otherwise would remain undone.

General Booth was born in Nottingham. His parents were Episcopalians. His mother was of a saintly piety and unusually powerful mind; his father, a good man and honest merchant. At fifteen he was converted at a Methodist prayer meeting, and joined the Methodist Church. Then he felt that there was laid upon him an imperative duty to rescue others. He went into the slums of Nottingham and preached in the streets. He was jeered, derided and stoned; but he kept on, and night after night he led his hearers to the chapel. He went into the country and preached. At twenty, he went to London and began his career there as a lay preacher, supplying local chapels on demand and preaching meantime in the slums. He saw that there were the people who most needed attention and had the least of it.

Meanwhile, the preaching of a remarkable sermon in a Clapham chapel, the pulpit of which he temporarily supplied, brought to him the acquaintance of Catherine Mumford, a young woman of extraordinary character and ability, whom he afterward married. She sympathized with him in his labors among the lowliest, and, until her death in 1890, she was his constant companion, counselor and assistant.

In 1858, William Booth was ordained a minister of the Methodist Church. The next three years he traveled as an evangelist through the English cities. The Methodist Conference of 1861 undertook to restrain him within a local pastorate. As soon as it became evident that the Conference would interfere with her husband's labors as an evangelist, Mrs. Booth, who was present, rose to her feet, exclaiming, "Never!" Then, with her husband, she left the hall. He started forth without a church or a pulpit, without prospects and without money, but absolutely undismayed.

William Booth went first to Cornwall, where he began a series of revival meetings that lasted many months and were very successful. Thence he returned to London to take up again the problems of the poor and the outcast. On July 5, 1865, he made his memorable venture. The old tent was pitched in the heart of Whitechapel, and, with the crudest accessories, he began to preach to crowds of unfortunates. That was the real beginning of his real lifework, although it did not until years later assume its definite shape.

After a time he moved farther east, to Mile End Waste, where his tent was destroyed one night by wind and rain. He found quarters in an ancient wool warehouse, with gaping windows through which the hoodlums pelted the congregation with sticks and worse things. Yet he steadily made headway; his audiences and his concerts rapidly increased. At last he hired the Effingham Theatre, a place that had borne but ill repute, and one Sunday the stage was filled with men and women who had been the worst and most dangerous in the district and who had been led back to honesty and virtue by William Booth. Branches were opened in many slum sections. Mr. Booth trained others in his own methods, and soon had a corps of capable assistants, mostly men that he himself had rescued, and these were soon preaching all about London. The new movement grew apace. After a few years it began to hold conferences, and by 1877 it was a well-known and powerful organization, called the Christian Mission. From this the Salvation Army was evolved by an accident. About Christmas time, 1877, Mr. Booth dictating to a secretary used the sentence, "The Christian Mission is a volunteer army."

Glancing over the paper, he struck out "volunteer" and substituted "salvation." Without his intention the phrase struck fire; many persons took it up and repeated it. They thought it exactly fitted to the movement, and by tacit consent adopted it. Then, as Mr. Booth was the head of the movement, they fell naturally into the habit of calling him "General." The preachers of the mission were designated as "captains," and little by little the whole military nomenclature drifted upon the organization. Titles, bands, corps, commanders and finally the symbolic flag of the Army seemed to come as inevitable things. The Salvation Army spread all about the United Kingdom, creating a wonderfully compact, well-trained, efficient, perfect body of workers. Then he sent it into one country after another, effecting in each the same system and achieving the same results. Often the Army met with great opposition, and its members had to face riots and suffer physical assaults; but with love and gentleness it overcame all resistance, and in the end won universal recognition as an agency for good.

Its practical charities are many and valuable. It conducts homes for children, for released convicts and for fallen women, workingmen's hotels, shelters for the unemployed, social institutions of many kinds, free food depots, lodging houses, laundries and vast industrial enterprises for those that need work. Its slum brigades incessantly attack not only sin, but all evil conditions. In one year, 1908, it supplied nearly ten million beds and 5,702,416 free meals. In the United States it has 889 posts, 79 workingmen's hotels, 3 farm colonies, 24 slum posts, 4 children's homes, 24 rescue homes for women, 89 industrial homes. Its meetings were attended by more than ten million persons. The War Cry, the organ of the Army, is published in twenty different languages. Sixty-nine other periodicals are published by the Army, many of them in foreign tongues.

GENERAL WILLIAM BOOTH, IN HIS EIGHTIETH YEAR

General Booth, at eighty, still personally directs all these enormous and diversified activities. He is still in every sense the actual commander and inspiration of the Army. When he travels in England, in his white automobile, it is like a triumphal tour. The roads are lined, the streets blockaded with cheering crowds. His tall, erect form, commanding presence, white beard and hair, wonderful gray eyes, and the whole expression of his face (that tells of sweet and gentle thoughts and a boundless sympathy) impress and win every observer.

And now this long record of generous devotion to human welfare he is crowning with a unique beneficence. He has planned a "University of Humanity," in which he purposes to train young men and young women, not for selfish and material careers, but for the highest of all ends—for service. A great, broad, advanced school, in which the student shall be instructed in the actual conditions of the race and the means, practical and theoretical, whereby those conditions are to be improved or alleviated. As General Booth himself expressed it: "I want to train men and women to deal with misfortune. I want them instructed, and to combat with the weaknesses and sins of the drunkard, the criminal, the pauper and the would-be suicide."

There will be branches of the University of Humanity in New York and Chicago. The raising of the necessary endowment fund will be begun on his birthday, and among the observances that will mark his eightieth anniversary nothing else will be so typical of the man and his career.

CHARLES EDWARD RUSSELL.

A Rival to Radium

ONE of the most important discoveries in medical science has just been reported to have been made by Dr. E. Stillman Bailey, of the Hahnemann Medical College, Chicago. The new discovery is called the "Thor-rad-X," and it may completely revolutionize surgery. It comes from pitchblende—the source of radium. It has all the curative effects of radium without its baneful after-results. As the supply is plentiful, it will be within the reach of people of small means. It is hoped it may cure locomotor ataxia. Dr. Bailey made his discoveries while examining pitchblende found in Colorado. When the substance was applied to the backs of patients suffering from locomotor ataxia immediate relief was experienced, and in some cases comparative cures were effected. The medical world awaits further results with great interest.

China's War on Opium

AN instructive review of the results accomplished since the issuance of the famous opium edict of 1906 appears in the North China Herald. Reliable reports from all the provinces show that while in some sections of the empire the officials and the public have co-operated to suppress the use of the drug, their efforts have met with little success. In others, either no attempt has been made to carry out the provisions of the edict, or the compliance is merely superficial. The explanation of this state of affairs is found in the fact that strict enforcement of the decree would deplete the provincial treasuries, consequently the officials will not act unless compelled to do so by pressure of public opinion. Still, the anti-opium reform is visibly gaining ground. Less of the drug is produced than formerly and public opinion is growing against the national vice at a rate which promises well for the next generation. The International Opium Commission, which met last month in Shanghai, has had placed before it the fullest information, not from China alone, but from all the opium-producing Oriental nations. That commission may be expected shortly to lay before the civilized world the results of its work. It will, no doubt, show that while much good has been done since the movement for the suppression of the opium traffic began, the great battle has yet to be fought for the emancipation of nearly one-fourth of the human race from a curse which commercial selfishness and official rapacity continue to perpetuate.

The New Tariff Bill

PRESIDENT TAFT'S first message is a model of brevity and conciseness, and simply informs Congress that the unsettled condition of the tariff is operating to the detriment of business, and besides, that the present revenues are inadequate to cover the government expenditures. He reminds Congress that the dominant party is pledged to revision. He points, by suggestion, to the passage in his inaugural message favoring an inheritance tax as one new available source of revenue. He closes with the hope that no other subject may be permitted to divide attention with the tariff during the session. Certainly, a short and business-like message, yet one with a straightforward firmness and independence in its presentation of things, which impresses even the casual reader with the conviction that President Taft is not going to follow models or carry out policies, save where they accord with his own conception of the fitness of things.

For four months the Ways and Means Committee of the House labored industriously on the new tariff bill, which Chairman Payne introduced on March 17. It is a voluminous document of some 234 pages, and includes in its numerous schedules almost every product or manufacture known to commerce. The basis of the bill is a minimum tariff, carrying heavy reductions from the present duties; but there is also a maximum tariff, 20 per cent. higher than the minimum, which applies to imports from those countries that have dealt unfavorably with American goods, or have shown discrimination against us by refusing the advantages granted to other nations. Under the Payne bill, the new tariff is so geared or adjusted that it seems to operate automatically in such cases. Wherever a country resorts to discrimination against us, the full force of the maximum tariff can immediately be directed against that country, and even many articles now on the free list may at once be made subject to the maximum duty. All existing trade agreements with Great Britain, France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Portugal and other countries are abrogated.

Turning to the bill itself, it quickly becomes apparent that it is one which makes a big breach in the high tariff wall. Yet, while it is in many respects the very reverse of the McKinley and Dingley bills, it will commend itself to the sense of the country as a fair and honest effort at tariff reform. It contains no recommendations for internal revenue except to increase the duty on cigarettes and to impose a tax on inheritances. The latter alone, it is estimated, will probably yield $20,000,000 of annual revenue. Tea, spices, oils, gloves, perfumes, soaps and cocoa are taxed higher, the increase on tea being 8 cents per pound when imported direct from the country of production, and 9 cents when it comes from another country. Coffee is untouched in the original schedules, but may be taxed before the bill is completed after due discussion. The taxes on hides, iron ore and wood pulp are repealed, and also on coal from lands where our coal is untaxed. Taxes on lumber, steel rails and steel products generally are reduced one-half; on pig-iron three eighths, on printing paper one-half to two-thirds. We are to have free trade with the Philippines, but there is a limit to the importation of sugar and tobacco from those islands. Works of art, if twenty years old or more, are free; otherwise the 20 per cent. duty remains. In a general way, it may be said that the tax is increased on all luxuries and that raw material is free. Articles to be used for the benefit of the public in museums, institutions or galleries, whether of a scientific, literary or artistic nature, are to be admitted free.

These are some of the present features, but there may be material changes before the bill becomes a law.

A Strong Hand in Cuba

REVOLUTION in Cuba apparently is not to flourish unchecked during the incumbency of President Gomez. Recently a man named Lavastada, formerly a captain in the Rural Guard, took to the woods with seven men, and tried to start an insurrection. Lavastada, it is reported, was disappointed over failure of promotion, and, true to the old idea of the disappointed West Indian office-seeker, sought to incite an insurrection to drive out the present government. He was captured, and shot while attempting to escape. Most of his men were made prisoners.

This whiff of insurrection caused great excitement in Cuba and a lifting of diplomatic eyebrows in Europe and America. Was Cuba independent six weeks to learn nothing by past experience? President Gomez, however, brought his fist down, and the first sputter of armed revolt went out. He was determined that Cuba should show the world that she could preserve order, and he said that the insurgents should be shot. The Cuban Constitution forbids the death penalty for political crimes, but the military laws of Governor Magoon are still in force until repealed. Gomez said disappointed politicians were trying to throw Cuba into a state of anarchy, and deserved no mercy. He said it was better to crush the trouble at the start than confirm the idea that Cuba could not govern itself.

It is to be feared that there is a wider conspiracy, however, in Cuba than this brush revolution would indicate. It is an odd state of affairs to American minds when the party out of power will start trouble which they know will endanger their country's independence, in order to gratify their own selfish ambition. Power before all else seems to be the too prevalent idea. It is to be hoped that the firm hand displayed by Gomez will teach a lesson of law and order to the revolutionists.

Hope On! Hope Ever!

Editor The Christian Herald:

In noting the set-back woman suffrage has sustained in two States this month, it occurred to the writer, as it doubtless has to others among your interested readers, that the cause of this temporary defeat is to be sought for in the insurgent attitude of those women who have unfortunately adopted the tactics of the English "suffragettes." Americans are not tolerant of such proceedings. We distinctly dislike the "suffragette" plan of operations, and as long as our women, or any considerable portion of them, cherish this delusion, so long will they find our legislatures opposed to their petitions. We have no objection to their innocent little feminine ways otherwise; they may trim their hats with eagles, or put 500 or even 1,000 buttons on their gowns, if it makes them happier; but we firmly draw the line at their imitation of the suffragette. L. M. D.

Harrisburg, Pa.

OUR correspondent expresses, somewhat too severely, the popular feeling here regarding imported "suffragette" methods, against which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has repeatedly warned the worthy women who are at the head of the present suffrage movement. No appreciation awaits a "violent sisterhood" in the United States. Their unruly tactics very nearly wrecked the movement in England. They will inevitably discredit it here, unless steps are taken to prevent it. At the same time, we do not adopt our correspondent's view that the "suffragettes" were responsible for the recent reverses. These arose from the fact that the time was not yet ripe for the focusing of the campaign in any State. Education and proper agitation must precede legislation. In this connection, a very clever English woman has given us two definitions which deserve to be remembered. "A suffragist," she says, "is one who persuades women to seek the franchise, and a suffragette is one who worries the men into granting it." It would be interesting to learn from our readers how they regard this distinction, and also whether they approve of the "suffragette."

The Waldenses Grateful

ROME, March 1, 1909.

DEAR SIR: The language of suffering is understood by every human being, and it moves those who have never known each other before to such a sympathy that only intimate acquaintance and long intercourse could secure. The magnificent display of human solidarity and of brotherly love that our great disaster has created no doubt is a strong encouragement for those who believe in the redemption of the heart from egotism and scepticism—hearts which are throbbing in compassion toward their stricken neighbors and in a position to understand the One who was moved with compassion on the multitudes; to accept his commandment, "As I have loved you, ye also love one another"; to realize the apostolic precept, "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ." The appalling catastrophe of Messina and Reggio will mark a special date in the triumphs of Christian charity.

We are particularly indebted to your kind-hearted and generous countrymen for their prompt and conspicuous help; and I beg you to convey the expression of our deep gratitude to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the valuable contribution of $5,000 you have kindly remitted to our committee.

Through the liberality of our own people in Italy, and of our friends abroad, we have been able to carry on an active and efficient relief work. With the help of our pastors, evangelists and colporteurs of Sicily and Calabria, we were in a position to study every case and to bring direct and appropriate relief.

Our Mission Board will have now to face the difficult problem of rebuilding church and manse in Messina, and to repair our premises in three other Sicilian and Calabrian towns.

As the Lord has provided for the bread that perishes, on behalf of the sufferers, he will certainly also enable us to dispense to them the bread of life, and help us to find the means necessary to rear again his house out of the ruins.

ARTURO MUSTON,
President of the Waldensian Missions in Italy.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

The Oldest Recorded Romance

FORTY centuries ago there was a brilliant man in Thebes, the pictures of whose imagination were immortalized in the stupendous stone structures of that city. The colossal proportions and stability of those buildings have been the envy and wonder of the centuries. He fell in love with a young lady, who became his bride. Their affection for and fidelity to each other have just been revealed by excavations in Egypt. The Italian Egyptologist, M. Schiapparelli, in the course of recent excavations in the Valley of the Queens, discovered intact the tomb of engineer Kha, architect of the mighty buildings at Thebes, and of his wife, Mirit. The tomb contained two huge sarcophagi, with a mummy in each, and also a large number of objects of domestic use, buried, according to Egyptian custom, with the dead, and including furniture, utensils, tools, clothes, boxes of linens, jewels, etc. The contents of the tomb have been placed in the Museum of Turin, arranged as they were found, and they form an interesting reconstruction of the private life of the ancient Egyptians. From an inscription on a papyrus, over sixteen yards long, found in the tomb it appeared that husband and wife had died within a few days of each other and were buried together. Among the most interesting objects in the tomb were the numerous boxes containing the wardrobe and articles of toilet of the young wife. Mirit had carried with her to the grave a dozen boxes, half of which, lacquered in white, probably belonged to the furniture of the bridal chamber. Some contained clothing of the finest material, carefully folded; others had in them combs, powder-boxes, vases and other articles.

The spade has become a faithful helper in scientific investigation and in religious interpretation. The opening of the tomb of Kha reveals the old story of the strong intellect that creates structures and cities; of the love that binds human hearts sweetly as husband and wife and makes them one; of the home where love and honor dwell; of the wealth that purchases comforts and luxuries; and of death, who intrudes to do his cruel work. And the story of four thousand years ago is the story of to-day.

That which hath been is now. (Eccles. 3 : 15)

Death Stopped the Prairie Schooner

J. W. Harrison, the evangelist, and his wife have been preaching the Gospel in all parts of our country, and in most countries of the globe, for well-nigh fifty years. The wife died suddenly at Plainfield, N. J., the other day, and the husband sent out this note on a yellow postal card: "My little wife is dead, in her seventieth year. We had traveled together for forty-nine years, preaching the Gospel from a prairie schooner in Australia, England and the United States. She has been a faithful wife, a loving mother, and a real Christian." Their prairie schooner, drawn by two old horses and labeled "Gospel Wagon," had visited most of the hamlets from Maine to San Francisco and from the St. Lawrence to the Gulf of Mexico. At the close of their Gospel services, they sold little patent potato peelers at ten cents apiece, and by that method largely supported themselves in their labor of love. On their way from Atlanta, Ga., to New York City, which had taken them about a year, they halted at Plainfield, N. J., where they had an humble home and where the wife suddenly passed to her reward. Mrs. Harrison was born of wealthy parents in London, and elected this life of humble ministry in company with her husband.

This quaint picture of devotion to Christ and the souls for whom he died is beautiful and pathetic. The little mistress of the prairie schooner has gone as a queen to her coronation.

Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord. (Matt. 25:23.)

Taft the Greatest World Traveler

President Taft, in the last nine years, has traveled over 200,000 miles—a much greater distance than any other person of prominence in ancient or modern times. In addition to the many journeys taken in this country, he went four times to Manila, including one visit on his way round the globe; five trips to Panama and two to Cuba. His habit of continuous travel began in this manner: President McKinley, in 1899, after Congress had provided for a Philippine Commission, asked ex-Secretary Day to suggest a head for the Commission. The President said: "I want a man at the head of the Philippine Commission who is strong, honest and tactful—a man of education and executive ability; a man fearless but conservative, and one who will get along well with the military authorities." "Why, Mr. President," Mr. Day said, "you have described 'Billy' Taft." Judge Taft was telegraphed for and went to Washington to see the President, and after two weeks' deliberation accepted the place as the head of the Commission, which position he filled with such honor to his country and blessing to the islands. President Taft's view of the wisdom of his travels was expressed just before starting on his trip around the world in 1907. He said: "Extensive travel is a good thing for a cabinet officer; it is mutually beneficial to him and the people of the localities in which he travels, because it enables him to get intimately in touch with local conditions and the people to gain a closer acquaintance with him."

There is no disputing the fact that the extensive travel of President Taft has made him a larger man, and made him more eligible to the great trust to which he has been called. The conveniences of travel, the migrations of men and nations, are tributary to the intellectual and moral development of the race.

Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased. (Dan. 12:4.)

The Great Find in the Ancient Tombs of Kha and Mirit, in Thebes

Memory Restored by a Camera

William Childs, aged thirty-five years, son of George William Childs, Jr., of Brooklyn, after having lost his memory, disappeared and was mourned as dead by his relatives for two years. He suddenly recovered his memory of himself when he heard the click of a photographer's camera. The camera brought back to him the fact that he was formerly a dealer in photographer's supplies. Two years ago, in Chicago, something snapped in his head, he said, and where he has been since no one knows. Three weeks ago he appeared in Milwaukee, and asked the county authorities to help him find out who he was. They could not help him. A photographer was taking his picture, thinking he might be another man who was missing and who had lost his memory, when the click of the instrument brought him back to his senses. He began speaking intelligently, slowly at first, then talked more rapidly, and began to cry like a child as he realized that he had been practically in another world for two years.

There are many persons who have lost their better self. Sin has so deranged their moral and religious faculties that they are lost in the mazes of a world to which they do not rightfully belong. A single word of a Sunday School teacher, plea of an earnest minister, prayer of a mother, tear of a father, admonition of a friend, or some accident, is the click of the camera that brings them to their real senses.

And when he came to himself, he said, I will arise and go to my father. (Luke 15 : 17, 18.)

The Laziest Man on Earth

The laziest man in the world is said to be John Mumera, of Jerseyville, Ill., who has been in bed ten years because he is unwilling to comply with the rules of the Jersey County farm, which say that every one living there shall rise at five o'clock in the morning. Before he had been at the farm a week he complained that the hour for rising was too early. One morning he failed to take his place at the breakfast table. Richard Mourning, superintendent of the farm, went to his room. "Time to get up!" he said. "I'm not going to get up at five o'clock in the morning for anybody," replied John. "You'll have to," said Mourning. That made Mumera angry. Shaking his finger at the superintendent, he exclaimed, "I'll never get up any more! I might as well stay in bed." The man kept his word, and will very likely remain in bed until the day of his death. He acts like a crank, who ought to have a place in some asylum, but he illustrates only a little lower type of physical indolence than is seen everywhere about us on the highways of life, and he is a pretty good picture of a number of people who are literally too lazy to put on and take off their clothes, who religiously stay in bed, day and night, all their lives. Some loud voice of man or God ought to arouse and impel them to Christian endeavor.

Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light. (Eph. 5 : 14.)

An Incident in the Life of John Wesley

From a Painting by Alfred Hunt

John Wesley Preaching on His Father's Tombstone in Epworth Churchyard

THERE is probably no incident in the remarkable career of John Wesley, "the founder of Methodism," so replete with tender human interest as that which occurred when he visited Epworth, his old home, in the summer of 1742. He had been absent for several years. Full of the desire to win souls, he went about making acquaintances with the people and renewing old friendships. He wished to preach in his father's church, but so strong was the feeling against the new sect that permission was refused, although his father's old parishioners crowded there to hear him.

Then followed the incident which the artist has immortalized in the picture. One of Wesley's biographers writes:

"John Taylor, a servant of the Countess of Huntingdon, and a very religious man, was with him, and, after the sermon, he stood in the churchyard and gave notice, as the people were coming out, that 'Mr. Wesley, not being permitted to preach in the church, designed to preach at six o'clock in the churchyard.' 'Accordingly at six I came,' says Wesley, in his diary, 'and found such a congregation as I believe Epworth never saw before. I stood near the east end of the church, upon my father's tombstone, and cried, "The kingdom of heaven is not meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." '

"Wesley remained eight days at Epworth, and every evening preached to the people from his father's tombstone. He must have felt deeply the associations of the place, but paused not to record his emotions; his one great work of preaching absorbed his every energy. His hearers, however, felt the power of his word and of the scene. He tells in his letters that one evening, when he was preaching of Ezekiel's vision of the resurrection of the dry bones, 'lamentation and great mourning were heard; God bowing their hearts, so that on every side, as with one accord, they lifted up their voice and wept aloud. Surely,' he adds, 'He who sent his Spirit to breathe upon them will hear their cry and will help them.'

"John Whitelamb, Wesley's brother-in-law, who had a church at Wroote, heard him preach at Epworth, and wrote to him saying: 'Your presence creates an awe, as if you were an inhabitant of another world. I cannot think as you do; but I retain the highest veneration and affection for you. The sight of you moves me strangely.' Mr. Whitelamb offered him his church, and he preached there twice. The same evening Wesley preached for the last time in Epworth churchyard to 'a vast multitude, gathered together from all parts,' on the beginning of the Sermon on the Mount. And then 'I continued among them for near three hours,' says Wesley, 'and yet we scarce knew how to part.' Then, alluding to his father's work during a long lifetime, he exclaims, 'Oh! let none think his labor of love is lost, because the fruit does not immediately appear! Near forty years did my father labor here; but he saw little fruit of all his labor. I took some pains among this people too; and my strength also seemed spent in vain. But now the fruit appeared; there were scarce any in the town, on whom either my father or I had taken any pains formerly, but the seed sown so long since now sprung up, bringing repentance and remission of sins.' "

KEEPING THE CHILDREN FROM THE STREETS

IN our large towns and cities one of the problems of the day is keeping the small boy off the streets, where he is likely to pick up bad companions and worse habits. Playgrounds are being established in some of our cities, but they are few in number, and in most places they are conspicuous only by their absence. The regulations of our public parks, the only breathing spaces, allow people to walk about the paths, while the small boy looks with longing eyes at the green lawn, which would make such an excellent place to play. The sign, "Keep Off the Grass," drives him back again to the street as a place for recreation. If there is much that is not pleasing in the morals and general character of the coming generation in congested districts, the lack of a proper place for the boys, during the formative period of their lives, to pass their leisure time will be largely responsible. Educators and others interested in the public welfare are realizing this more every year, and are endeavoring to arouse the American "city fathers" to take some active interest in the various plans proposed.

America is not alone in this condition of affairs, and one plan worthy of study is being tried with great success in Copenhagen, in Denmark. Children's reading rooms have been opened in various parts of the city, where the population is crowded together in unattractive homes. The money for the reading rooms is supplied entirely from the purses of public-spirited men and women, the city government not yet taking any part in it. The rooms really have bright pictures on the walls, and there are books, entertaining and educational, historical tales, and stories of adventure. The rooms are really a combination of library and club room. A lady greets the child as soon as he enters, and helps him pick out some interesting volume. If the child would rather have some one read to him, the lady in charge does so, or he can bring some older person with him to read or explain the books or pictures. Milk is given free to any of the children who wish for it. If such reading rooms could be generally established here, to be opened during the winter, when even the streets are not very attractive to the small boy, and public playgrounds were opened as soon as the readings closed for the season, the young men of to-morrow would be much better equipped for the duties of citizenship and the children's courts would have fewer cases. The growing system of children's libraries in our America is a step in the right direction, but of necessity they cannot assume the mixed character of library and boys' club room, which is needed in the poorer districts.

Speaker Cannon Taking the Oath of Office in the House of Representatives, March 15, at the Opening of Congress

EVERY man who has been in Congress for more than one term has probably stowed away carefully in some recess of his heart the ambition that, if he is never elected Senator from his own State, he may rise to the dignified position of Speaker of the House. In fact, if he was sure that he could reach that position, he probably would not leave it for any office except that of President of the United States.

Hon. Joseph Cannon, Representative from Illinois, has again been elected Speaker, having been nominated by the Republican caucus and voted in on March 15, despite some active operations against his candidacy, carried on by the "insurgents," who objected strongly to Speaker Cannon's somewhat autocratic methods. Recently he has been called the "Iron Duke" of the House, a title probably not at all displeasing to the Speaker.

Immediately on being sworn in, Mr. Cannon thanked the Representatives for again electing him to preside over their deliberations.

"The election to the high office," he said, "which I now have for the fourth time by virtue of your confidence and judgment, is a compliment the honor of which I do not underestimate, and of which I am not lacking in personal appreciation. We have before us a most important and difficult session of Congress. The adjustment of the national revenues has been, since the foundation of the government, a fundamental question, yielding to none other in importance. Even in the Civil War the question of adequate revenue marched side by side with the valor of our armies and the patriotism of our people. And in time of peace, even disordered finances are a prolific source of national ills, not as acute as those of war, but yet fruitful of calamity for the general interest and suffering for the individual. These considerations should animate us to a high devotion to the duty before us. We must subordinate personal feelings to the general good, trusting to the considerate judgment of the people for approval of our work when it shall have been completed."

There was a sharp fight over the rules to be adopted to govern the work of the House for the coming session. The old ones were adopted with some modifications. The rules, in their present form, date back to the days of Speaker Reed, of Maine, who carried things with a strong hand during his term of office. The rules were devised in the opening session of 1890.

After the Speaker was chosen, the members elected a sergeant-at-arms, a postmaster for the House, a doorkeeper and a chaplain. The chaplain chosen was the Rev. Henry N. Couden, of the State of Michigan. He has served preceding Congresses as chaplain and is very popular with the Congressmen from all parts of the country.

The next day, before the tariff bill was taken up, the annual drawing for seats occurred. This, as usual, was carried on with a great deal of laughter and good-natured banter, political and personal animosities being forgotten for the time, while all joined in the fun. All realized they had a hard session before them and were glad of a little relaxation after the strain of the Speakership contest and before they turned their minds to the mathematical and commercial problems confronting them in the tariff measure and plans for raising an adequate revenue.

A GREAT OPPORTUNITY IF YOU ACT AT ONCE

WE urgently request all who desire to take advantage of our remarkable WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA offer, advertised in our issue of March 10, to send in their orders at the earliest possible moment. We knew that this exceptional opportunity to secure the greatest of up-to-date Encyclopedias at the low price of $15 on Easy Instalments—or $13.50 if Paid Spot Cash—would be eagerly snapped up by our readers, but we did not anticipate such an avalanche of orders in so short a time as our advertisement has brought in.

Already we have sold considerably over twelve thousand sets of this incomparable work, and the balance of our edition is being rapidly exhausted. Therefore, if you want this great Encyclopedia, write us immediately. Even a day's unnecessary delay may mean disappointment. Make sure by acting to-day.

The publication of this splendid master work has been in response to the great need of countless young men and women for some means to further Educate Themselves. In this magnificent library the earnest seeker after knowledge will find able discourses on all matters of general interest, and up-to-date information on subjects of particular importance to-day. The great discoveries of Science, the growth of Arts and Literature, the latest improvements in Handicrafts, the principles of Law, of Medicine, of Commerce and of Agriculture, are all unfolded before the delighted eyes of the reader.

The young man starting in business will find in the WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA'S articles on General Commercial Studies a fund of priceless knowledge, which, if diligently absorbed and applied, will mean bigger opportunities and a larger financial success for him in his chosen profession. The Artisan, the Merchant and the Farmer will likewise find invaluable information in many articles of supreme interest and vital importance to them. The General Student will be able, with this Home University at his disposal, to pursue his studies in Literature and Language, History, Astronomy, Botany, Chemistry, Geology, Physiology, Mineralogy, Physical Geography, Physics, Mathematics, Mental Science, Engineering, Politics, and a host of other subjects of no less importance.

Man is never too young nor to old to learn, and YOU, whatever your age or vocation, if you desire to accomplish bigger and better results in your daily occupation, cannot make a finer investment of $1.00 a month than by purchasing a set of the WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA—provided you apply yourself to a systematic course of study.

Remember, A Guide for Any Systematic Course of Reading Accompanies Every Set FREE.

The complete set of 12 Massive Volumes measures 9x26 inches, weighs 40 pounds, and is sent, securely boxed, by freight, at purchaser's expense, on receipt of only $1.00 down and your pledge for $1.00 per month for fourteen months, or $2.00 down and $2.00 per month for six months. For further particulars read carefully the four-page special insert in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of March 10.

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

Has Drudgery a Value?

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

ONCE in a while there comes over us a temptation to rebel against drudgery. We rise and begin our work. It may be kindling the fire and preparing breakfast; it may be washing children's faces and seeing that little boys have clean hands and tidy hair, properly brushed, before they go to school; it may be standing behind a counter all day long; it may be anything that is duty and that has to be done at a certain time and in an appointed way. The famous little heroine, "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," put it into an amusing couplet,

When joy and duty clash, let duty go to smash; and if we are candid many of us will confess that there are moods in which that sentiment has appealed to us. Yet we cannot "let duty go to smash," and we are compelled to go straight forward, doing our share of it, and the real value of drudgery is that it means for us discipline and drill. Look at the recruit in the awkward squad, and compare his clumsy movements with those of the finely trained soldier. Observe the skill with which an athlete throws a ball or catches it. Watch the fingers of a famous pianist as they waken in the instrument such wondrous melody as holds an audience spellbound. The athlete, before he was taught, could not make the ball obey him, and there was a day when the musician sat before the keyboard and played five-fingered exercises with monotonous reiteration. Drudgery has, in every case, brought skill to perfection.

When drudgery adds to the comfort of our dear ones, when it makes the home happier and fills the cup of life with sweetness for child or aged one, it has in it an element of the divine. We never associate the thought of drudgery with our divine Lord, who spent the three crowded years of his public ministry in such incessant labor as no other human being ever undertook. The whole of that marvelous three years is summed up in a line, "He went about doing good." From morning until evening he had not one hour to himself, and, in order to get time for prayer and communion with his Father in heaven, he had to seek the mountain passes and the lonely forests, in the silence and darkness of the night. The example of our Saviour has forever sanctified drudgery and given it a value beyond any other thing on earth.

Young people frequently find the drudgery of the schoolroom irksome. Why must they toil so hard over difficult examples? Why must their exercises be so carefully written and their recitations so thoroughly prepared? Why must to-day's work never be left until to-morrow? Are the teachers unjust in their demands? Are the examiners excessive in requiring a high percentage before promotion? Not at all. The drudgery of the schoolroom fits the student for the work that awaits him in maturity, and without it neither man or woman would attain a fine development or prove of much use in the world.

It is drudgery that makes us able "to serve the present age, our calling to fulfil."

ON THE WALL

Happy little Isabel has a morning all for play.
Who will come and play with her ere the morn has passed away?

Hoarding versus Spending

To spend money foolishly for every trifle that awakens desire in the end brings its own reward of the empty purse. Very few people have an unlimited account on which to draw. If a young girl, for instance, a boy in his teens or a newly married couple yield to the temptation to buy everything that fascinates them by its beauty or pleases by its convenience, each and all will reach the day when they will be obliged to go without something that would supply a felt want. There is real pleasure in spending money for one's self or one's friends, and a good salesman often succeeds in persuading a hesitating buyer that money spent will be a good investment. He may be right, or he may be wrong. The point is that no sensible person deliberately spends money beyond his means.

On the other hand, hoarding is as unwise and short-sighted as its opposite. To save money simply for money's sake is the passion of the miser, and leads to untold wretchedness. No habit is more easily formed than that of false economy. A woman who can afford to have help in the harder work of her house, and who refuses to secure it on the ground that she can manage somehow to get through it with her own hands, wastes health and strength that she may save money. She will be fortunate if she is not obliged to pass what she saves to the credit of the physician and the druggist. Money is a talent lent to its owners by the Lord, and they are responsible to him for the use they make of it.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—A TRAVELING SUIT FOR AN AUTUMN BRIDE. The most satisfactory material for your traveling suit will be a light Panama cloth or a serge, either plain or twilled. Have a skirt of instep length, and a jacket of the same material, with a silk shirtwaist matching your suit in color. Your hat should be of dark straw, simply trimmed and not too large.

IN THE FIELD

Frances is the summer's self, standing 'mid the summer's bloom,
With the waving field to be just her lovely palace-room.

The Ladies of the White House

NO greater proof of the adaptability of the American woman to the demands of an occasion, and of the ease with which she adjusts herself to any position, can be found than in a glance at the ladies of the White House. From first to last each woman who has been elevated to the dignity of Mistress of the Executive Mansion has shown herself fitted to adorn the high place, and has acted as though her entire previous life had given her a special training to be the First Lady of the Land. The wives of our Presidents have been uniformly gentlewomen, although they have sometimes come from simple surroundings and have not always had much previous acquaintance with conventional society. Each in turn has been the gracious and cordial hostess, the wise and sensible matron, the personage who received guests or dispensed favors precisely as if she had been a princess royal and not merely a royal republican. When the Presidential household has been under the care, as has sometimes occurred, of a niece, a sister or a daughter, the President has had no reason to blush for the success of the lady in her difficult role. The truth is that an American woman is endowed naturally with the tact of her French sisters, the poise of her English cousins and the solid good sense of her German acquaintances. In short, she is about the best little woman in the whole world.

BY THE FENCE

Here is Gladys full of fun. She has gathered fragrant flowers,
And her merry thoughts have run faster than the golden hours.

Patience With Those Who Serve the Public

An article recently published in one of the magazines throws a flashlight on the lives of conductors and motormen in the metropolis. Wishing to investigate their service at first hand, Mr. Albert Sonnechsen, well known as a trustworthy writer for the press, a man, too, who has seen life under many skies, last summer entered the employment of a New York street railroad as a conductor. His recital of a conductor's ordinary day, including fourteen hours of nerve-exhausting toil, with small pay and petty exactions, is so vivid that it must convince any fair-minded passenger that he or she should not expect more than mere civility from an over-taxed conductor. The only marvel is in the light of Mr. Sonnechsen's revelation that so many of us escape with our lives, and that conductors in general are so courteous. The public may have cause for complaint, but it should be directed higher up than the employees of street railroads.

PROVIDENCE AND PRAYER*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

HERE is a miracle indeed: the once timid Peter, chained to a soldier on each side; three prison gates between him and liberty; his death sentence signed and sealed by Herod, and in the hands of officers, with orders that he shall be brought forth and beheaded on the morrow. Simon Peter sleeping in such circumstances when his friends cannot sleep for anxiety, but are gathered to pray for him. It was not the light and troubled sleep of those worn out with anxieties. He slept so soundly that when an angel deliverer flooded his prison with light as of sunrise he did not awake, but only when the angel had struck him in the side. Imagine a man condemned to die in a few hours, lying down for sweet sleep beside his open grave! Such sleep is the triumph of trust, as well as the proof of innocence.

This change in Peter is as great a miracle as his deliverance by the angel messenger sent of God. It may even be a greater miracle, because it concerned the soul of Peter rather than his body. It was vastly more important that he had been delivered from fear of those who reviled Christ than that his body was delivered from the prison.

"Be not afraid of them that kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell" (Matt. 10:28).

"Why are ye fearful?" Some persons are hardly ever free from fear, except in sleep, and even then they have fearful dreams. They live in perpetual torment; burglars, cattle, horses, water, fire, firearms, and multitudes of other objects are a terror to them. They say, "You never can tell what is going to happen, so be prepared for the worst." Before using any argument with persons of this kind it might be well to try to laugh them out of their fears by giving the following incident:

There is a cleared trail leading from the home of a lady at Indian River, Fla., to the beach, half a mile away. It runs through a jungle of cabbage palmetto, live oak and saw palmetto. She was returning from the beach alone one day, armed only with an umbrella.

When a quarter of a mile from the house, she heard the rustling of some animal coming toward her through the saw palmettos. Thinking it must be a raccoon, she quickly picked up a chunk of palmetto wood, and held it ready to whack the animal over the head the instant he emerged.

All at once, and with a mighty rustling, out stepped a big black bear within six feet of her. The surprise was mutual and profound. Naturally, the lady was scared, but she stood her ground and said nothing.

The bear rose on his hind legs to get a better look at her, making two or three feints in her direction with his paws. Feeling that she must do something, the lady pointed her umbrella at the bear, and quickly opened and closed it two or three times.

"Woof!" said the bear. Turning about, he plunged into the palmettos and went crashing away, while the lady ran homeward as fast as she could.

Bears are not the only sort of thing that disappears when we come face to face with it.

The Unnecessary Terrors of Ignorance

An amusing story is told by Mr. Woodford, the resident commissioner in the British Solomon Islands. During last year, it appears, a horse was imported from Australia by a trader for use on his cocoanut plantation. This was the first horse that had ever been brought to the Solomons. There was some difficulty in landing the animal, and, after spending a day on the platform lashed between two boats, it had to be towed over a coral reef. After the landing was effected the natives evinced the greatest dread of what seemed to them a gigantic creature, and could not be induced to go near it, with the consequence that it soon became unmanageable and wandered at will about the bush, a terror to the neighborhood. From some unexplained cause the animal died a month or two after the arrival, to the intense relief of the natives. Ignorance is the mother of a great many terrors, and many of the fears that torment us are as ill-founded as those of the natives of the Solomon Islands concerning that greatest friend of man among animals, the horse.

At least inquire whether it is a friend or an enemy that you fear. Fear and fret are first cousins.

God's Fear Nots

"Bind them about thy neck. Write them upon the tablet of thy heart."

"Fear not, for I am with thee, and will bless thee."

"Fear not, for I have redeemed thee."

"Fear not, for I am with thee."

"Fear ye not the reproach of men, nor their revilings."

Jesus said to those who are slandered, "Fear them not, for there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed."

To those who are persecuted, "Fear not them that kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul."

To those who mourn, "They shall be comforted."

To those who are in want, "Fear ye not, ye are of more value than many sparrows."

To those who fear death, "Because I live, ye shall live also."

To those who fear they have no place in heaven, "I go to prepare a place for you, that where I am, there ye may be also."

If it were not good for the soul's health to overcome fear, it is necessary for the health of the body. It lowers vitality, lessens power to resist disease, even brings on disease sometimes, as in epidemics; it cuts nerve and injures efficiency; it is said to have a paralyzing, blighting influence upon the whole being. A lady was invited to take a sail across Yokohama Bay on a steam launch with a friend, who was a physician. He wanted her to go on a visit to see one of his interesting patients. It was rather difficult to climb the stairway swinging at the side of the slip, but the coming down was worse. The physician tripped down to get his launch ready, never thinking his lady friend would have any difficulty getting down; but she stood at the top of the stairway, perfectly unable to make her feet move. She thought herself paralyzed, and called to the physician in alarm. He laughingly came up the stairway, and took her hand to help her down. Immediately her feet moved and she speedily reached the bottom of the stairway. Surely if one is to act bravely in emergencies, there must be a habit of casting aside fear. On Thursday Island, which is the first landing in Australia after passing Torres Straits, one may visit the Memorial Cathedral, which is erected to the memory of those who perished a few years ago in the wreck of the Quetta, from Scotland. Out of more than two hundred passengers there were only three survivors, two women and a babe. The women were in the water for over twenty hours, one with her babe. If they had been timid women, afraid of their shadows, they would not have lived to be rescued. For the sake of body and soul, "Cast out all fear." It is a Christian duty.

Angel Messengers

An angel stood by Peter in the prison, and awoke him by striking him on the side. It does not appear that Peter was therefore alarmed; if he had been, he might have cried out, and spoiled God's plan for relief. But Peter did exactly what the angel told him to do: he rose up quickly, and as the chains fell from his hands he tightened his garments and put on his sandals, preparing to follow the angel out of the prison. We read of other persons in the Bible to whom angels were sent: to Elijah, as he lay under the juniper tree, exhausted by fear of Jezebel, and his long and hasty flight. When he was awakened by the angel, and told to eat of the food prepared, he did so, and went in the strength of it forty days and forty nights on a long journey to Mount Horeb.

The Tower of Antonia, Prison of Peter

An angel came to Gideon when he was engaged in threshing wheat, in a secret place, for fear of the Midianites. But Gideon did not fear the angel, and received the message from God to be the leader who should go out against the hosts of Midian. When his courage rose to the high point of opportunity, he made one of the bravest of brave leaders.

The lovely girl-woman received a visit from the angel, who told her that he who should be the Saviour of the world should be her son, and her soul burst forth into song, which we are pleased to call the Magnificat.

An angel messenger came to Paul on the dismantled ship, being tossed in the tempest. How did he get there? We are not told, only that he brought a message of comfort and assurance to Paul, who in turn gave it to those who had lost all hope of coming to land, or of being saved. The message was very brief: "Fear not, Paul; thou must stand before Cæsar: and lo, God hath granted thee all them that sail with thee." And when Paul had assured his shipmates that not one of them should perish they all took courage and ate food, which they had not tasted for many days.

But would common folk like you and me be afraid of angels if they should come to us? I fear we would—some of us. A little girl was timid about going to bed, and, being left alone in the dark, her mother tried to assure her by telling her that God always sent angels to watch over little sleeping children, and she hummed a song:

> When children lay them down to sleep,
> Two angels come their watch to keep;
> Covering them up safely and warm,
> Tenderly guarding them from harm.

"Oh," said the little girl, "how frightened I should be to wake up and see them. I would rather have my own folks."

> How sweet it were if, without feeble fright,
> Or dying of the dreadful beauteous sight,
> An angel came to us, and we could bear
> To see him issue from the silent air
> At evening in our room, and bend on ours
> His divine eyes, and bring us from his bowers
> News of dear friends, and children who have never > Been dead indeed,—as we shall know forever.
> Alas! we think not what we daily see
> About our hearths, angels that are to be,
> Or may be if they will, and we prepare
> Their souls and ours to meet in happy air,—
> A child, a friend, a wife whose soft heart sings
> In unison with ours, breeding its future wings.
> —Leigh Hunt.

Seeing with Angel's Eyes

"If there are angels who look into the ways of man, how different are the notions which they entertain of us from those which we are apt to form of one another! We are dazzled with the splendor of titles, the ostentation of learning, the noise of victories. They, on the contrary, see the philosopher in the cottage, who possesses his soul in patience and thankfulness, under the pressure of what titled minds call poverty and distress. They do not look for great men at the head of armies, or among the pomps of a court, but often find them out in shades and solitudes, in the private walks and by-paths of life. The evening walk of a wise man is more illustrious in their sight than the march of a general at the head of a hundred thousand men who have won a victory.

"A contemplation of God's work, a voluntary act of justice to our own detriment, a generous concern for the good of mankind, tears shed in silence for the misery of others, a private desire of resentment broken or subdued; in short, an unfeigned exercise of humility, or any other virtue, are such actions as are glorious in their sight, and demonstrate men great and reputable. The most famous among us are often looked upon with pity, contempt, or indignation; whilst those who are most obscure are regarded with love."—Joseph Addison.

"The Premiums Are Fine"

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The premiums, Inside Story of the White House and the Art Gallery De Luxe, came duly to hand, and I must say that they are fine. It should be quite an inducement for people to subscribe for The Christian Herald in order to get such fine presents, and to receive one of the best weekly Christian papers.

The Little Doctor

A Serial Story Written for "The Christian Herald"

By AGNES LOWE ELLIS

THE dinner was an elaborate affair. In addition to an immense turkey, Aunt Phœbe served them to chicken salad, prepared after a particular recipe brought from her old home, and other dainty dishes. The dessert consisted of famous pumpkin pies, and especially delicious doughnuts, which she considered necessary for every dinner.

Aunt Phœbe was delighted with her guests' appreciation of her dinner. A variety of fruit and sweetmeats followed the more substantial edibles, and some of the dainty silver and cut glass, which were heirlooms in her own and her husband's family, started her to telling stories of the people who had once used them.

When they had returned to the parlor, the conversation naturally turned to the expected return of the travelers, and, in recalling the young men's first introduction to the house, Aunt Phœbe spoke of the music which had been such an enjoyable feature of the afternoon and asked Dr. Verner to sing to them some songs of his own choice. He complied willingly and Mrs. Hunter and Lily, who had not heretofore known of his musical talent, were delighted.

He sang several touching Spanish and American airs, and Mrs. Hunter was much moved.

He had never seen her so deeply touched, and when he had finished, he lifted her white hand to his lips and whispered, "Thank you, mother." She kissed him tenderly, and that kiss seemed to set the final seal to his adoption.

Aunt Phœbe led Dudley to speak of his youth, his native land and his loneliness. When her questions seemed to be probing a little too deeply George skilfully turned the current of conversation into another channel.

"I see Jack's sleigh coming," he cried, and they all rushed to the window.

CHAPTER XXI

JACK had come to carry the young men to his house to make the promised visit. He drew up to the door with his usual flourish and was immensely pleased when he saw not only Dr. Verner and Mr. Hunter ready to go with him, but Miss Lily and little Donald.

Aunt Phœbe had filled a large basket with slices of cold turkey, pies, and a variety of other good things, including a large supply of apples for the children. With this stowed away safely in one corner, the party started off, Jack taking them by a roundabout way in order that they might see a number of places of which he meant to give them the history.

What a change had come over Jack! His humble, almost servile bearing was gone. The air of the dignified entertainer, the dispenser of favors, had taken its place.

He pointed out many points of interest and showed a knowledge of the town and its surroundings, and of its present and former inhabitants, which surprised his guests.

They found the home of the Greens a poor old frame house which looked as if it had never known paint, and from whose windows many panes were missing, and were supplied with old clothes.

The interior showed an attempt at cleanliness and order, and all were favorably impressed with the shy, gentle-looking wife and her two beautiful little girls, who were neatly though plainly dressed.

Jack seemed rather proud of his Betsy and the two children, Mary and Becky. The little girls were very shy, but gradually responded to the kind advances of the visitors. Mrs. Green was singularly self-possessed and at her ease, "a real, natural-born lady," as Dudley afterward said. Lily led her into conversation, and learned that she was the daughter of well-to-do parents, who, early in life, had left her an orphan in the care of a neighbor, to whom for years she was as a dear daughter. She was only eighteen years of age when she lost her heart to Jack Green, then a dashing young beau, and the admiration of all the country maidens round about. He had not prospered in a worldly way; they had had a struggle to keep alive; but his Betsy, or Lizzie, as her parents had always called her, laid all the blame at the door of an unappreciative community.

"Jack is a capable fellow, and ready to do any kind of work that comes in his way," she said. But her opinion of him was not held by his neighbors. Poor Jack had dawdled through the years, little caring how the world wagged, so that he and Betsy and the children had enough to eat and wear, and apparently never thinking that any special exertion was necessary on his part.

Jack had offered to take the little party out to the place occupied formerly by one of Branksome's wealthiest men, but now a mere wreck, deserted and uncared for, and reputed to be haunted.

George asked him if he believed in ghosts, and receiving a rather evasive answer did not press the matter further just then; but he determined to sound Jack about it later.

Dudley and George agreed to go to see the haunted house; but Lily and Donald preferred to stay with Mrs. Green and the children. Lily's heart yearned over these poor, neglected creatures, and she decided to speak to her aunt and see if something could not be done to better their condition.

She noticed that the children's eyes wandered occasionally to the well-filled basket standing near the door, and she ventured to say: "Mrs. Green, we, especially Donald, are not used to such long rides in the cold. Would you mind if I should make some coffee and open our lunch-basket here?"

Mrs. Green expressed herself as decidedly in favor of such a course, and presently the little party, Miss Sanborn and Donald, Mrs. Green and her two children, were enjoying a bounteous luncheon in the little old kitchen.

Lily found Mrs. Green to be a very intelligent woman, with a mind far beyond the sphere in which she lived, and the girl's heart went out in an intense longing to help and comfort this sister in distress.

The coffee, cold chicken, biscuit, cake and sweetmeats were dispensed with liberal hand, and the meal was enjoyed all the more because it had not been given as a charity, but had been turned into a common feast for all. Just as they were about to remove the remnants and put the house in order, the sound of sleigh-bells was heard and the sleighing party soon entered.

Jack, at the suggestion of George, told them the story of the "haunted house."

"Wal, you see," he commenced, "Captain Thorn settled in that house, bringing his wife to it as a bride. The captain had made a deal o' money in furrin parts, and when he came to live there, everything was in fine style.

"They had men servants and women

THE LITTLE DOCTOR

servants—about a dozen of 'em—and horses and carriages—in fact, everything the heart could wish.

"One night the old captain was coming home from a trip to New York, riding horseback, when his horse shied at something on the road and threw him. One of his men had been on an errand for Mrs. Thorn, and he spied the horse give a fling to one side of the road and then gallop off.

"When he came up, he found the captain on the ground with a great gash in his head, and the blood streaming from it. Wal, the poor critter that found him was scared mighty bad, and they said when he went to the house for help he was white as a sheet. Mrs. Thorn ran out to the road to see her husband and she got such a fright that she never knew a well day afterward."

"Did the man die?" asked Donald.

"Die? Why, yes! He was about dead when they found him."

"And what became of his wife?" asked George.

"Some kin o' hers came and took her away, bag and baggage, and the old house was empty for years. Folks used to see a light thereabouts, they said, and hear a voice a-callin' for some one; but never a person, man, woman, or child, could be seen.

"Year after year went by, and at last two fellows said they'd find the ghost; so they went to stay all evening around the place. Tom Smith and Bill Jones were the two. Wal, along about ten o'clock, Tom came a runnin' like mad into the town, said he heard the voice plain as could be, a-askin' who they were. His face was as white as flour, and his hair fairly stood up on end.

"The folks begun to get uneasy like about Bill, seein' he didn't make his appearance, and in about an hour, a little squad of fellows went out lookin' all along the road to see if mayhap he was a lyin' near dead o' fright by the roadside. On they went, seein' no sight o' him, until they got to the gate o' the grounds, and out walks Bill, a-laughin' fit to kill.

"'Fellers,' he called to them, 'I've found the ghost. There may be more than one, but I've found one of 'em and killed him.' You may believe this made the fellows stare. 'Yes, I killed him and he is here,' says Bill. 'I'll show him to you if you want to see him.'

"Some o' them turned to run, but the bravest waited to see—and Bill, stoopin' down, picked up a big old horned owl, the kind that cries out, 'Who! Who!'

"Wal, you may believe Bill was a good deal of a hero after that, and Tom never heard the end of his runnin' home; though I never could see a mite o' difference between Tom and the folks that was too scared to go and hunt the ghost."

THE MAN WHO LOOKED LIKE LINCOLN

MR. DANIEL WALFORD, an old and much respected citizen of New York, who passed away recently at the home of his daughter, Mrs. M. J. Olvaney, 235 West Fourth Street, New York, had long been noted for his wonderful resemblance to Abraham Lincoln. So frequently had he been mistaken for the great Emancipator that he became known as "Lincoln's double."

Mr. Walford, who was born in England in 1822, was 6 feet 2½ inches in height, or about half an inch shorter than Lincoln. He had the same stooped shoulders and rugged features, the same melancholy eyes and the same sympathetic smile.

Shortly after his arrival in this country, in 1853, he became active in temperance work. At a meeting in the Bowery Mission in 1854 (just 55 years ago) he was speaking from the platform when some one told him that his "brother" was in the back of the hall. Wondering who the "brother" could be, Mr. Walford went to the rear of the room and there he was introduced to Abraham Lincoln. Both men were struck by the remarkable likeness each bore to the other, and a friendship was formed that lasted until the President's death. When they were together, it was a hard matter for those who did not know them intimately to distinguish them. To put it in Lincoln's words to Mr. Walford: "You couldn't look any more like me unless you were me."

Daniel Walford

Mr. Walford was one of the leaders in the organization of the Working Women's Protective Union, formed during the Civil War, and which has continued in existence up to the present time. He was also a prominent Mason and Knight Templar. He was intensely interested in the advancement of workingmen and of temperance. His motto for the workingman was: "Don't drink, but think." He was an earnest, godly man, and a great lover and helper of his fellow-man.

He leaves three children, ten grand-children and twenty-three great grand-children.

Near to Death

Rev. Frank H. L. Paton, of the New Hebrides Mission, writes from Melbourne, Australia, that the mission work is going on encouragingly. "Our last mail brings news of a plot against the life of one of our missionaries, Rev. M. Frater, of Paama and Ambrim. Under Mr. and Mrs. Frater's earnest work nearly the whole island of Paama has become Christian. But on Ambrim the people are still determinedly heathen. One of the chiefs determined to massacre Mr. Frater and his family. The missionaries were in grave peril, but calm in the thought of God's presence. The chief repented of his evil designs, and the missionaries were saved."

BURPEE'S Farm Annual for 1909. A fine collection of choice and well selected seeds. At this firm's (W. Atlee Burpee & Co.) two places—Fordhook Farms, in Pennsylvania, and at Sunnybrook Farm, in New Jersey, all things are tested. The number of field trials averages about seven thousand, while more than fourteen thousand soil tests for vitality are also made every year. Much time and money are expended in "proving stocks" at their farms, while great care is exercised in cleaning and handling seeds in their warehouse. The Annual successfully meets all the requirements of the farm, orchard, garden and lawn. Illustrated. Pp. 174. Published by W. Atlee Burpee & Co., Philadelphia, Pa.

John Lewis Childs' Spring Catalogue of Seeds, Bulbs and Plants for 1909. This contains selections from the latest specialties and novelties in rare seeds, etc. The extensive Childs plant offers a full variety to buyers throughout the country. Much valuable information is given concerning the kind of soil to plant in, time of blooming, etc. Illustrated. Pp. 139. Issued at Floral Park, N. Y.

Everything for the Garden for 1909. Issued by Peter Henderson & Co., 35 and 37 Cortlandt Street, New York, N. Y. This old and well established firm offers this year a comprehensive and well illustrated catalogue, which presents an extensive selection. Especial attention is called to their Lawn Grass Seed, which makes the finest lawns, golf courses, etc., and is a valuable aid in making the grounds of many homes in this country more beautiful. This booklet also gives a well selected line of vegetables, fruits, flowers, etc., and contains interesting and sound advice. Illustrated. Pp. 200. Finely colored covers.

The Maule Seed Book for 1909, issued by William Henry Maule. Especially interesting to vegetable growers, as it embraces the best up-to-date varieties. Very convenient for buyers making selections. Also has a choice collection of flower seeds. Illustrated. Pp. 152. Published by William Henry Maule, at 1711 Filbert Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Iowa Seed Company's Catalogue for 1909. A comprehensive guide of choice seeds for vegetables, flowers, fruits, farming implements, window garden supplies, etc. Established forty-four years. Pp. 133. Illustrated. Issued by the company at Des Moines, Ia.

D. M. Ferry & Co.'s Seed Annual for 1909. An attractive and well illustrated catalogue of garden products. Pp. 98. Published at Detroit, Mich.

The Storrs & Harrison Company's Descriptive Catalogue of fruit and ornamental trees, shrubs, roses, perennial plants, etc., grown at the well-known Painesville Nurseries. Describes a full line of fruit and ornamental trees, grapevines, small fruits, roses, shrubs, climbing vines and hardy plants, with instructions for planting, spraying, etc., profusely illustrated with half-tone cuts from photographs. Pp. 112. Price 10 cents. Catalogue No. 2 for Spring of 1909 is another of this firm's practical booklets, which are a great aid. Free upon application of planters. Illustrated. Pp. 168. The above catalogues are published at Painesville, O.

James J. H. Gregory & Son's Vegetable and Flower Seed Catalogue. A compact and useful guide to all interested in buying seeds. Illustrated. Pp. 0. The catalogue is sent free to all, and is issued at Marblehead, Mass.

J. J. Bell Seed Company's Twenty-second Annual Catalogue. A presentation of many varieties. Illustrated. Pp. 36. Published at Deposit, N. Y.

To Our Mutual Advantage

WE have still just a few remaining copies of that famous little masterpiece, THE WEDDING RING, by the late Rev. Dr. T. DeWitt Talmage, which a short time ago we advertised at the special price of 25 cents until the balance of our stock should be closed out.

We again direct attention to this inspiring and widely popular volume and the low price at which we have offered it, because after April 15 we must positively decline to fill further orders. Therefore, if you wish us to mail you a copy, will you not favor us with your order at once.

Address before April 15, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BOOK DEP'T, 92 Bible House, New York City.

Answered Prayers

Mrs. M. E. H., Iowa. "God has answered my prayers when in deep trouble."

M. J. G., Louisiana. "I prayed, and God heard and answered my prayer."

Reader, Ohio. "God has wonderfully answered my prayer in a recent trouble."

Mrs. C. W. F., Ohio. "I wish to acknowledge that our Father has answered my prayers."

J. H. W., New Mexico. "I wish to thank God for answering my prayer in a financial way."

E. B., North Dakota. "I am very thankful to God for restoring me to health, through prayer."

Mrs. J. N. W., Maryland. "My petition seemed almost hopeless, yet the prayer was answered the same day."

Mrs. Z. L., Texas. "I wish to testify to God's goodness in answering our prayers for help in time of need."

J. S. W., California. "I wish to add my testimony to say that God has been good to me and answered my prayers many times."

M. J. McC., Brooklyn, N. Y. "I promised God that if he would answer a prayer of mine I would publish it in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The prayer is answered."

WHY TAKE LESS THAN 5 PER CENT.

If your money earns but 4 Per Cent. instead of 5 per cent., the income from it is not enough by ONE-QUARTER.

If your emergency withdrawals of principal cause you to lose earnings for weeks or months, the profit is reduced to perhaps 3½ or 3 per cent. With equal assurance of safety, the higher rate is worth considering.

The Industrial has not paid less than 5 Per Cent. per annum in all the 16 years of its existence. It is a stronger institution at the end of every year than it was the year before. Its present Assets are over $1,900,000, with Surplus and Profits of $138,000. It is supervised by the New York Banking Department, and its records are open to public and private inspection. If you would be convinced how conveniently you can transact your business with us by mail, we should like to refer you to our patrons in all parts of the country—some probably in your own locality—who permit us to use their names.

WE PAY 5% on any sum from $25 to $3,000. Earnings are reckoned from day of receipt to day of withdrawal, and withdrawals are at your pleasure, subject only to 30 days' notice.

20 Beautiful Volumes
29 Able Authors
42 Popular Biographies
7,568 Ample Pages

REMARKABLE SACRIFICE SALE OF VALUABLE BOOKS

WE ARE closing out at a bargain a few sets of the "MAKERS OF AMERICAN HISTORY," a library of popular biography which contains more entertaining and instructive reading than any other work of its kind ever published. In these twenty beautiful volumes will be found the life stories of forty-two great Americans ---men who moulded the history of the nation. An entire volume is devoted to Abraham Lincoln, in whom so much special interest centers this year. Each biography is a complete story in itself, written by some eminent authority, such as Capt. A. T. Mahan, Gen. J. G. Wilson, Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, Prof. W. G. Sumner, Prof. R. H. Thurston, James Schouler, and others equally well known. In these lives is interwoven the narrative of American history from the earliest times down to the close of the Civil War period.

NO OTHER WORK LIKE IT

To read these volumes is to be grandly entertained, and at the same time to come into intimate contact with the great heroic characters in American history. This is the only work which covers the whole field and is at the same time of distinguished authorship. For an hour's pleasant reading or for serious study no other work will compare with it. There is not a dull page in the entire 20 volumes, which are beautifully printed, bound in art cloth, and illustrated with portraits, maps, plans, etc. Every hero and patriot is treated, not in the dry and technical form so common to biography, but in a simple, fascinating style that will appeal to all who enjoy good, wholesome reading.

HERE'S OUR GREAT OFFER

We have on hand a few sets of this splendid library in fine art cloth, which, from handling in our stock room, are not in perfect condition. For all practical purposes they are as good as new; in fact an expert could hardly tell the difference. The lot is so small we have decided to close them out for $1.00 down, and $1.00 a month until the full amount of the special limited clearance price, $19.50, has been paid. The subscription price is $30.00.

FREE—For Five Days

On receipt of the accompanying coupon we will send you a complete set, for five days' examination, carriage prepaid, subject to return at our expense, if you do not find it the greatest bargain ever offered. The work will be a valuable addition to your library. Do you think you can afford to miss this chance?

Risen With Christ*

THE figure of the resurrection, as applied by Paul to the inner life, is one of the most impressive in all the Scriptures. We are dead in sin. Our aims are earthly. Our highest ideals are tinged with selfishness. Christ comes into the soul. The dry and shriveled husk becomes instinct with life. The spirit soars. Self is forgotten. The loftiest ideal of service that the world has ever known takes possession of the whole being. The resurrection of the body is to this resurrection of the soul but an idle and unimportant thing.

How shall we know that the soul is thus renewed? By its works. That is the only way in which faith is clearly made manifest.

Has the sharp or gossiping tongue become kind, restrained and free from scandal? Has the envious and jealous spirit become generous and loving? Has the close and stingy hand unclosed, shedding bounty upon the needy? Has the quarrelsome one turned the other cheek to the smiter, and given the soft answer that turneth away wrath?

Unless these changes are plain to the family and the community in which you live, you may reasonably infer that, since "newness of life" has not come to you, the "old man" has not truly been "crucified with Christ."

"But," you may justly say, "I cannot change all at once. The natural traits, no matter how hard I may struggle, may for years overcome me. Long-time habits cannot be altered without great and prolonged effort."

This is true; but the signs of effort must be made apparent, and repentance for lapses must be expressed, in cases where wrong to others has been done. No one ever becomes perfect; all that the best can do is to keep on trying, never knowingly or willingly yielding, until the last breath is drawn. Unceasing prayer and a determined will, with much study of God's Word, are the unfailing helps to progress. As Charles McKinley says: "The earthly Church is not for those who have attained, but for those who press on; not for those already made perfect, but for all penitent sinners, that they may be cleansed of their sin; not a university for those who have taken one or more degrees for religious achievement, but a common school, where all God's children are to be taught his service."

Mr. Amos R. Wells has illustrated this theme by a story of St. Gaudens, which would doubtless apply to every artist in every line. When he had to make a statue of General Sherman, he dreamed and brooded and planned for many years. Then he produced a model. It was exhibited in Paris, but the sculptor was not satisfied with it. Another model was shown at our Pan-American Exposition. Still another model was to be seen at the artist's studio at Windsor, Vt. The final form of the statue differed from any of these, and was most satisfactory of all. He kept on trying until the best within him was expressed.

We see through a glass darkly here below. At first, we perceive almost nothing. As we study more deeply the character of our great Model, little by little the light dawns upon us. We still grope. We cannot discern clearly, but if we struggle onward, the way grows plainer, faith grows stronger—we see the Leader's hand, we grasp it, and at last we are ushered into the perfect day, where we see face to face.

"In the secret places of your heart you have heard distant music. It is to this secret music that the march of your outward life has been timed." The secret music of which the poet tells us is Christ's living call, awakening our dead souls.

* Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, April 11. TEXT: Col. 3 : 1-4.

The Risen Saviour*

MR. WILLIAM N. BREWSTER, for seventeen years a missionary in China, considers this century to be "the crisis of the ages in the Christian propaganda. It may be that no previous generation could have evangelized the whole world. A generation ago, the political and social barriers in China, the physical difficulties in Africa, the fanaticism in Turkey, the caste system in India—all seemed to be immovable. They are not so today."

This intelligent writer considers that the evangelization of the world is to be effected by the training in each pagan land of groups of native workers—after the pattern set by our Lord, in especially instructing and endowing the twelve.

This method appeals to every common-sense mind, and it is no doubt that which is being followed by the most successful missionaries in almost every field. No foreigner can appeal to such numbers of people as, other things being equal, one can do who is of the same race as themselves. But these native preachers must, as a rule, be trained from childhood in the Christian faith. Therefore, time and broadly educative Christian institutions scattered throughout heathendom, become essential elements in the solution of the problem. There is no quick road to heathen evangelization any more than to other great things.

Mr. Brewster, like most of the new school of missionaries, pleads for practical ethical and industrial helps to go hand in hand with Gospel preaching. The awful poverty of the people; their abject acceptance of filth, vice, misery; their ignorance; their diseases; these incapacitate them for the reception of any sort of lofty spiritual truth. We must cleanse and heal their bodies; make them comfortable; and brighten and inform their dull minds before the risen Saviour can be properly apprehended by them.

The overweening conceit of pagan nations is, perhaps, as great an obstacle as any to their conversion. In the judgment of most of them, their country is the most enlightened and glorious in the world. If they have ever heard of any other, it has been to think of it as infinitely inferior to their own. No matter how wretched may be the personal lot of any man there, he still, never having heard of a better fortune for such as he, cherishes a sublime faith in his own land.

Thus, on a Chinese map of the world, two feet by three and a half, the Celestial Empire occupies nearly the whole surface, while Europe and Africa appear in an upper corner as small islands.

Thompson, in his Protestant Missions, reminds us of a similar instance of Oriental hyperbole, in the self-esteem of Ormuz, a barren rock in the Persian Gulf. It once had some consequence, and its inhabitants coined the proverb, "The world is a ring, and Ormuz is the gem which it contains."

It is far easier to teach the humble-minded than the proud. Never was truer word spoken by our Lord than that, before we could be converted, we must become as little children.

To us Christians, at this Easter season, in this twentieth century, may well come the message spoken by brave Von Welz three hundred years ago: "Is it right to keep the Gospel to ourselves? Is it right for Christians to spend so much on clothing, eating and drinking, and to take so little thought about spreading the Gospel?"

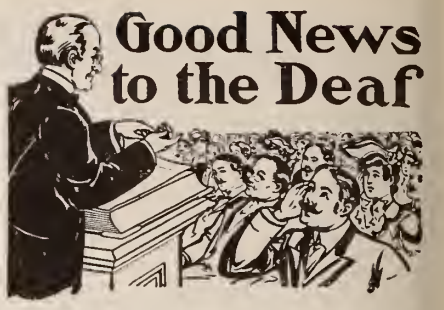
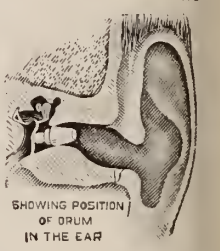
Good News to the Deaf



You owe it to yourself, family and friends to at least investigate the claims we make for the WAY EAR DRUMS.

Write us to-day. Tell us the cause of your deafness and how long you have suffered, and we will send you positive proof which you yourself can verify that the Way Ear Drums will help your case. If you were born deaf or have become totally deaf, don't write, because our drums will not help you.



But at least 90 out of every hundred cases can be very materially benefited by our wonderful invention.

The Way Ear Drums are made from a peculiarly sensitized material moulded to fit the inner ear. They collect the sound waves and centralize them on the drum so that by their aid even whispers can often be heard distinctly by people who cannot without them distinguish loud and clear voices.

They will stop instantly the annoying "head noises" from which so many deaf people suffer.

In justice to yourself, write us to-day about your case. Be sure and address your letter

The Resurrection Hope

By Mrs. M. Baxter

"NOW is Christ risen" (R. V., "hath Christ been raised") "from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that sleep"—the first fruits in that he would not die again, as presumably the sons of the woman of Sarepta and of the Shunamite, Jairus' daughter, the son of the widow of Nain, Lazarus, and Dorcas did, although the fact is not stated. But in a deeper sense, the first fruits, as the second Adam, who, in his own person, "abolished death, and brought life and incorruption to light, through the Gospel."

The resurrection of the body was revealed to Abraham, "the father of them that believe," when he was called upon to yield up his only son, "accounting that God is able to raise up even from the dead, from whence he did also in a parable receive him back."

In the Psalms (16:10; 49:15, etc., etc.; in Job 19:23-27; in Isa. 26:19; Ezek. 37:11-14; Dan. 12:2; Hosea 13:14), as well as many other passages in the Old Testament, we see the resurrection of the body clearly foretold. It is especially the hope of the Jew, as translation is the hope of the true Church of Christ. Israel, as a people, shall be called out of the death and corruption into which they have fallen nationally through the judgment of God upon them, for their idolatry and their rejection of God's Messiah—a judgment which will be transferred to the Gentile—so-called Christendom—when the now ripening apostasy ("falling away"—II. Thes. 2:3) from the Word of God and faith in the Divine Son of God, has come to the full (Rom. 11:11-22). But the answer of our Lord to the question of the Sadducees about the resurrection shows that for some Jews, at any rate, there will be a resurrection to live in the future age (millennium). "They that are accounted worthy to attain that age (R. V.), and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage, for neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the angels; and are sons of God, being sons of the resurrection" (Luke 22:35, 36, R. V.).

Turning back to I. Cor. 15, we see (verses 21, 22) that since by man (Adam) came death, by Man (Christ) came also the resurrection of the dead; for as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive. But each in his own order: Christ the first fruits; then they that are Christ's at his coming. "They that are Christ's" answers to the men of whom Christ says to his Father, "Thou gavest me out of the world. Thine they were, and thou gavest them to me." And then he describes the characteristics of these given ones: "They have kept thy Word." This excludes even believers who are ignorant of, or who doubt or criticise the Word of God. The given ones are such as received God's words and believed that the Father sent the Son. They who "are Christ's at his coming" have their citizenship in heaven, from whence they look for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall fashion anew the body of their humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his glory, according to the working whereby he is able even to subject all things unto himself (Phil. 3:20, 21, R. V.). The apostle Paul himself left all for this.

The apostle (I. Cor. 15:29-34) turns to the practical question of readiness, which touches both the "out-resurrection" and translation. He says (verse 29, R. V., Gr.), "Else what shall they which are baptized for the dead do? If the dead are not raised at all, why are they then baptized? Why do we also for them stand in jeopardy every hour?" From what follows, we understand the apostle to speak of those who have been martyred, and who are expecting possible martyrdom, but whose hope lies on the other side of death; translation if the Lord comes, resurrection if he tarries.

WHO ELSE WANTS THIS DOLLAR BOOK FREE?

Our 1909 Book—Newer Styles—Lower Prices

THIS DOLLAR BOOK—now fresh from the presses—is offered free to anyone who has a home. Send no money, no stamps. Simply say that you want it, and we will send it postpaid. Here you will find pictures and descriptions of 3,000 new style things for the home. That is a greater variety than you could find in any retail store in Chicago. The pictures are perfect; some are in actual colors. And every article is a new creation. You can pick out things in this book, sitting by your own fireside, better than you could in any store in the world.

WE TRUST YOU FOR

Carpets--Rugs	Lamps--Clocks	Washing Machines	Baby Carriages
Silverware	Refrigerators	Talking Machines	Draperies, Etc.

Every article in this book—large and small—is sold on credit. You can have what you want, use and enjoy it, then pay as convenient—a little each month. Yet every price is guaranteed lower than anyone quotes for cash. We charge no interest and ask no security. Our dealings are all confidential. A person who wants to make home more attractive is the right sort of person, and his credit is good with us.

OVER A YEAR TO PAY

Think what that means. No need to wait for the money. No need to go without things that you want. You can have them at once and enjoy them. Then you can take, on the average, more than a year to pay, so one hardly feels the expenditure. This is the modern way—the pleasant way—to buy house furnishings. In the larger cities more than 60 per cent of all furniture, carpets, etc., are sold on this plan. Now you can buy, wherever you are, on the same terms we give to people next door to us.

30 DAYS' FREE TRIAL

You buy nothing from us until you see it and use it for 30 days. Simply say what you want and we send it to you on approval. Use it a month. If you don't find the article satisfactory—don't find our prices lower than anywhere else—return it at our expense. You are under no obligation.

ASTOUNDING PRICES

Compare the prices in this book with prices at your local store. Or compare them with prices quoted by cash mail order houses. You will be astounded to see the difference. This comes partly through our tremendous buying power. It is also due to our being content with a very small margin of profit. We sell on credit exactly as low as for cash. And we defy any mail order house—cash or credit—to duplicate our price on even a single piece.

15 TO 50% SAVED

We know every price that is quoted by others, for that is our business. And we guarantee to save you from 15 to 50 per cent under any other price in America. If you find that we don't, you can send the goods back, for everything is sent on approval. We shall be glad to have you order elsewhere the same thing you order from us. Then return the one which seems to give least value.

500,000 CUSTOMERS

This is the largest concern of its kind in existence, with a combined capital of $7,000,000. We have more than 500,000 customers, and our mail order buildings cover six acres of ground. In addition, we own 25 mammoth retail stores in the heart of the largest cities. Thus we control the output of scores of great factories, and sell direct to the user. It would be folly for any smaller concern to even attempt to compete with us.

Think of a store with more than a half million customers. Does it not prove that we offer in styles and prices some things that others don't offer? Please learn, for your own sake, what this great concern means to you. See what we offer—see our liberal terms. Send today for one of these books.

Illustrated History OF ALL Nations

Fifteen Massive Volumes

BY SPECIAL arrangement with one of the leading publishing houses in the country, we have secured for our readers a limited number of sets of that Foremost Historical Work, The Illustrated History of All Nations, by Israel Smith Clare, reviewed and endorsed by fifteen Professors of History in American Universities and Colleges, and other Prominent Educators.

This De Luxe Edition, which we now offer to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at exactly half price, comprises fifteen sumptuous volumes, richly bound, superbly illustrated, beautifully printed and brought right down to date, including prominent and significant events of recent years, both at home and abroad.

Almost Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand Dollars have been expended on the production of this colossal library, which as it now stands, with its recent contributions from eminent historians and scholars, is unquestionably the Greatest Achievement in the Whole Range of Modern Historical Literature.

Every Volume Absorbing

Not only is the Illustrated History of All Nations a comprehensive and complete record of the history of mankind, but the whole narrative is invested with a human interest that makes the story of the world and its peoples, its immortal heroes, its great men and famous women, far more absorbing than any work of fiction.

Beginning with the dawn of recorded thought, and tracing the progress of mankind, the growth and development of governments and races in all ages and nations, through all the highways and byways of Ancient, Modern and Medieval History, the absorbing narrative carries us on.

No stone in all the tables of time has been left unturned, from the oldest records of ancient dynasties down to the present day of wireless telegraphy.

Here is History told in a way to remember; never for even a moment does it lapse into a dry, prosaic recital of facts, but every volume tingles with full-blooded life as the ever changing, thrilling panorama unfolds before us, engrossing from first chapter to last. Search as you may through the writings of the world's greatest historians, you will nowhere find such a clear-cut, vivid and graphically real presentation of the leading facts and factors that have slowly shaped the histories of nations.

Volumes Measure (WHEN CLOSED) 7½x10 In.
5,000 Pages; 64 Colored Maps
338 Rich Full-Page Illustrations

The masterly editorial direction of the work, the profuse contributions from distinguished essayists, and the mechanical perfection of each volume, have everywhere assigned this Magnificent Library of Universal History to first place in the libraries of prominent statesmen, professors and scholars.

Binding and Typography

The Fifteen Large and Beautiful Volumes are very handsomely and substantially bound in rich silk-finish art-cloth, stamped in genuine gold, with the lettering in real gold on deep red panels. The type is unusually large and very clear, and the paper on which the text is printed is an especially heavy, rough-finish stock, of a particularly beautiful texture. The exquisite illustrations are printed on fine coated paper as full-page inserts.

Exhaustive Index For Reference

No more complete system of indexing has ever been devised. Each volume contains its own table of contents. Every chapter is then, for greater convenience, subdivided into sections, and the contents of each section is indicated by a subhead in large type. To further summarize the text, a brief memorandum of each paragraph is printed in bold type on the margin of every page. Finally, in the last volume is the General Index to the complete work, which answers every probable question of contents.

Superb De Luxe Edition

Three hundred and thirty-eight full-page illustrations enhance the beauty of this costly edition of the Illustrated History of All Nations—large exquisite half-tone engravings, that give life and fresh interest at every turn of the narrative, and make the set easily worth double our present price for it.

These superb illustrations are reproductions of wonderful paintings by master artists of the world, most of the originals being in the great galleries abroad. It would be impossible to say too much of these superb pictures or to adequately describe their richness and beauty.

Every Volume is further enriched by a splendid frontispiece in duo colors, which feature alone adds immeasurably to the value of these great books.

In addition to the remarkable illustrations throughout the work, sixty-four beautifully engraved colored maps, historical, political and geographical, are added to the many special features of this matchless edition. These maps—many of which were specially engraved for this work—serve to make the leading facts of history doubly clear, and are invaluable to the student.

For Busy Men and Women

The Illustrated History of All Nations strikes that rare point, "a happy medium"; it is neither too brief nor too lengthy. It is the history of all others for the busy man or woman who has not the necessary time or means for exhaustive research, but who would be well-informed and at ease with persons of scholarly culture.

Young men and women, boys and girls who cannot have the advantages of a college education: the Illustrated History of All Nations broadens your horizon, gives you a comprehensive knowledge of life past and present, widens your opportunities and enables you to discuss intelligently the affairs of your own and other days.

From the countless glowing testimonials received from distinguished statesmen and prominent writers who enthusiastically endorse the Illustrated History of All Nations, we print the following extracts:

WALLACE RADCLIFFE, D.D., Washington, D.C.: "The history of religion is succinctly and fairly given. The style is compact, clear and graphic. The illustrations are superb."

REV. W. C. BITTING, D.D., New York: "Every parent should put this work within the reach of his children."

SENATOR WILLIAM B. ALLISON, of Iowa: "This Library of Universal History is, in my opinion, the greatest historical achievement of the century."

RICHARD HEATH DANBY, A.M., Ph.D., University of Virginia: "Southern readers will be gratified at the impartial spirit in which the war for Southern independence is treated."

M. Barthou, Cabinet Member

One of the Squares of Paris, Where Crowds Collected

Premier Clemenceau

A STRIKE THAT TIED UP A NATION

NOT since the days of the Paris Commune, in 1871, when the civil war was carried on in the streets, have the people of the French capital been so stirred as they have by the strike of the telegraph and telephone operators and postal employees, which for a time isolated them from the outside world, and spread to all parts of the outlying provinces. In America, where the lines are controlled by private companies, the strike could not have assumed the political importance it has in France, where the lines are government property and the men government officials, and the strike was directed against the minister of the cabinet in charge of the telegraph and against the government itself. It thus lost its aspect as a strike against economic conditions and became a political one, verging on revolution, for the malcontents were eager to join with the strikers and upset the republic.

The trouble arose from the fact that the government had planned, with the approval of Parliament, to introduce a partial merit system of promotion to replace the previous system of promotion, which was entirely by seniority and was affecting the whole system with "dry rot." The new plan was similar to that in use for some time in the French army. The employees wished to stick to the old plan, and the first riot occurred on March 14. This was quickly stamped out, but during the next few days matters grew worse. Railway mail clerks refused to go on their trains, telegraphers would not send messages, and here and there throughout the city people could not get their mail, as the telegraphers were joined by the other postal employees, including the mail carriers. The telephone service, every little while, was practically out of commission. A general strike was declared by the central organization of postal employees, and meetings were held throughout Paris. Women took a prominent part in the demonstrations, speaking from chairs and barrel-heads, on street corners and in the public squares. Those who remember the history of this hotbed of revolution against every form of government which has been tried in France were immediately struck with the alarming thought of how near a political upheaval the city might be. Women incited the men in the bloody days of the French Revolution, and have fought behind the barricades in every insurrection which has crimsoned the streets of Paris since that day. So vehement were their speeches against the postal department that over forty of the feminine orators were taken to the hospitals suffering from nervous exhaustion. The anger of the strikers soon centred on M. Simyan, Under Secretary of Posts and Telegraphs, and they made insistent demands for his removal. By the 16th, foreign calls were answered infrequently, and the city seemed as if in a state of siege. No news could be sent from Paris to London or back. The Bourse had a wire between the two capitals, which it was able to use for a time, but bankers and brokers suffered immense losses, not knowing anything of the condition of foreign markets. Messengers were sent by rail to Havre and then by boat across the channel to the British telegraph offices.

By the 15th, Paris was completely cut off from the outside world, all of the operators as far north as Havre and as far south as Lyons having joined forces with the Paris strikers. Mail-bags lay in great heaps at the stations, as the employees would not touch them. The government saw that it must act at once or revolution would be the result. M. Clemenceau, the French Premier, approved of Simyan's position. Telegraphers were brought in and government business transacted as best it could be. The men at the Elysée had struck. These understand the cipher messages, and the Premier was greatly embarrassed, as some of them related to the Balkan crisis and the prestige of the country was liable to fall in the eyes of the world if it was found to be at the mercy of the strikers while important diplomatic negotiations involving peace and war in Europe were being carried on. The matter was brought up in Parliament, and the Chamber of Deputies, urged by M. Barthou, Minister of Works, in a dramatic speech to support the authorities, passed a vote of confidence in the government, which at once began decisive measures. The order given was: "Work or clear out." Troops began to swing in from the outlying fortresses, and the streets re-echoed to the blare of bugles, the shriek of fifes and the roll of drums. The men were in campaign dress and ready for business. Each man carried his cooking utensils and provisions so they could camp in the streets. The military operators were drafted from all parts of France and messages began to go out from Paris. The soldiers became letter sorters and letter carriers. Everywhere could be seen the sturdy little infantrymen in blue coats and baggy red trousers, with mail pouches slung across their shoulders inquiring for various streets. The majority of the people actively supported the government when they realized the danger. The Temps spoke of the strike as one without motive and said, "Among the rights of government officials there is not and never can be the right to strike; that is to say, the right to hurt the entire country in order to bring about the triumph of claims which are at least open to debate." After displaying aggressive tactics for a week more, the employees voted to return to work; some, however, remained out. Paris is still uneasy, as it fears that the strike was merely the first part of some wider effort to overpower the government.

The Bourse, Where All Business Was Suspended During the Strike

The Divine Gardener

An Easter Sermon by Robert Stuart MacArthur, Minister of Calvary Baptist Church Since 1870*

ONCE more we welcome with joyful songs our risen and victorious Redeemer; once more we see him march forth with stately step, triumphant over death and the grave; once more we can sing the exultant words of the apostle Paul, "Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

It is impossible to overstate the value in Christian thought and life of the resurrection of our Lord. His empty grave assures us of the completion of his redemptive work. It gives us also a living and reigning Saviour at the right hand of God. It assures us of our own glorious resurrection on the world's great Easter morning, when the tombs of the whole earth shall be empty. The doctrine of the resurrection is but vaguely taught in the Old Testament; in its full significance it is a product of Christianity, and rests on the resurrection of Christ. Apart from Christ, death has always been the king of terrors. Probably we are safe in saying that the resurrection of the righteous is taught by the prophet Isaiah; that Ezekiel could not have written his thirty-seventh chapter if he had not known that doctrine; and that Daniel distinguishes between the resurrection of the just and the unjust. Probably, also, in the Book of Job and in some of the Psalms the idea of the continuation of the communion of the righteous with God after death is taught. But in the New Testament the light shines brightly on the glorious doctrine of the resurrection. Christ distinctly called himself the "resurrection and the life"; he affirmed that he that hath the Son of God already possesses eternal life. The apostle Paul, in his great argument, as given in I. Cor., fifteenth chapter, an epistle written before the earliest Gospel, shows that already the resurrection was part of the apostolic creed. In II. Timothy, it is affirmed that Christ hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel. With Socrates, Seneca, Pliny, Cicero, and all other thinkers of classic Greece and Rome, the hope of immortal life was at best vague and doubtful. The Gospel sheds unclouded light on the problems of the ages. Socrates and Cicero would joyously have hailed its supernal light and glory. Christ's resurrection is the foundation stone of the Christian Church.

Once more we have read and heard the sweet story of our Lord's glorious resurrection. Often as we have read and heard it, it never grows old; it comes to us on this joyous Easter morning with all its original beauty and power. It has often been told in this pulpit, and it will be told so long as this pulpit is loyal to Christ and his Gospel. We give the old story a new setting on this glad morning by speaking of Christ as the Divine Gardener. Was there ever a more suggestive supposition? Was not this hasty thought a heaven-born conception regarding Christ? Was not Mary of Magdala divinely inspired in this hasty supposition? She saw the Christ through her tears, and mistook him for the gardener. She, however, was entirely right in her supposition. The second Adam, as truly as the first Adam, was a gardener. The history of the race stands in close connection with three gardens—the Garden of Eden, the Garden of Gethsemane and the Garden of the Resurrection. Let us study some of the characteristics of our Lord as the Divine Gardener.

He proved to be a Personal Gardener to Mary of Magdala. She needed his gentle ministrations as the Celestial Gardener; she was a frail flower, lying prone as the result of the storm and trial through which she had passed. She needed the personal ministries of the glorious Christ to restore her to strength and beauty. Great wrong has been done to Mary of Magdala in making her identical with the woman spoken of in Luke 7:39. There is not the slightest evidence to support this opinion. How Mary of Magdala came to be identified with this woman it is difficult to imagine. In supposing that Mary was a woman of depraved character we have done her a grievous wrong. Through the centuries she has suffered from this unjust imputation, growing out of an untrue interpretation. We cannot too strongly affirm that there is not a single word in Scripture to justify her identification with the woman named by the evangelist Luke in the passage just cited.

Christ and Mary in the Garden

She appears in the narrative of which the text forms a part as one of the most devoted followers of the Lord Jesus. Her soul is filled with a burning desire to find his sacred body. She declares that if the presence of his body is an offense she will herself carry it away to a place where it may receive becoming honor. She does not stop to think of its weight, increased by a hundred pounds of spices; her love takes no account of difficulties. That love profoundly moves our hearts as we study the story. She belonged to the company of devoted women who, > while apostles shrunk, could dangers brave,

> Last at his cross, and earliest at his grave.

Through the veil of her tears she did not at once recognize her Lord; but his personal ministry in pronouncing her name revealed his presence. That name thrilled her soul; in it is the music of Easter bells; in it are the first notes of celestial songs. In pronouncing that name the Gardener raised the frail lily from the ground, and caused it again to bloom and emit its fragrance. In a transport of joy she exclaims, "Rabboni!" The Celestial Gardener does his best work when he reveals his own blessed personality. Christ comforts us most when he most manifests himself. We need not so much a doctrine as we need a person in our times of greatest sorrow. Here our Lord showed his highest skill as the Divine Gardener. Only he could pronounce the name Mary in those tender and thrilling tones. He is the Good Shepherd who knows his sheep and calleth them by name; and they, in turn, know the celestial music of his matchless voice.

The work of the gardener is manifold; he has often to render fruitful barren soil. In many parts of our own country, great fields are now fruitful because of irrigation—fields which once were simply barren sand. Deserts in Egypt have become gardens because of the waters of the Nile. The Divine Gardener has a similar work with the hearts of men. He has to break up the fallow ground; he has to introduce the water of life into the arid soil. He has great joy in his work. All life and growth are full of mystery. Growing plants inspire peculiar affection; frail flowers almost become the children of our love. Not otherwise is it with the Gardener who is cultivating the plants of Christian graces in our souls; he is training plants and vines for fruitfulness on earth, and for full fruition in heaven. He is, indeed, a Purposeful Gardener. His one purpose is to secure fruit; thus God is glorified, and men are proved to be plants in the heavenly vineyard. The entire process of dealing with plant and vine is to secure abundant fruitage. The dresser must sometimes use the pruning-knife, until vines and plants bleed as if their life were hopelessly injured; but the entire purpose is to secure fruit for time and for eternity. It thus came to pass that Mary and the other disciples were developed into nobility of character and usefulness of life alike by their sorrow and their joy. We must not pass hasty judgments on the methods of the Divine Gardener. He knows what is best for us in soil and rain and sun. As the Good Shepherd, he has a peculiar affection for the sheep of his pasture. As the Divine Gardener, every plant has a special place in his loving thought and in his gentle training. All the chivalry of his divine-human soul is called out in his treatment of the vines, plants and flowers in his garden. He is training these plants and flowers for the Paradise of God. The Gardener shall not be disappointed regarding the fruitage of his toil. Our divine Saviour shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied. The heavenly Husbandman shall reap great harvests of ripe grain in the coming autumn. All earthly sowers shall return with joy, bringing their sheaves with them. Great multitudes shall be

Roosevelt Off For His African Hunt

"I THANK Dr. Klopsch and the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD most heartily for this expression of their good wishes," said ex-President Roosevelt, in his apartments on the great ocean liner Hamburg, of the Hamburg-American line, about an hour before the start, on March 23. He was about to begin his journey to the wilds of Africa. As the ex-President spoke he gave a cordial hand-grasp to the representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who brought Dr. Klopsch's message of godspeed and good cheer. It was the only publication accorded a separate greeting by the ex-President on this most interesting and memorable occasion.

Shortly afterward, the representatives of the press were admitted in a group to Mr. Roosevelt's presence to hear his formal statement to the public. The ex-President said that a large mass of mail was then in his rooms on the steamer to which it would be impossible for him to reply, no matter how desirous he might be to recognize the interest and kind feeling of the writers. Fully six thousand letters had been received by him since his return to private life, and it was obvious to his hearers that even the physical effort of replying to so many communications was out of the question. It would be useless for any one to write to him during his journey to Africa, or while there, as, he added, he would be unable to answer. One of the newspaper men suggested that Mr. Roosevelt might again be a candidate for the Presidency, whereupon the ex-President said quickly: "Good-by, gentlemen!" and started for his stateroom. He relented, however, stepped back and shook hands all round, thus terminating the interview.

The apartments occupied by former President Roosevelt are those known as the "Kaiser's suite," having been prepared for and occupied by the German Emperor on two occasions when traveling on this line. There are separate sleeping rooms for the ex-President and for his son Kermit, provided with every facility for correspondence, and a parlor or sitting room.

A touching incident of the ex-President's preparation for his African journey was a visit to the aged Mrs. Mary Ledwith, who for very many years had been a nurse in the Roosevelt family. Mr. Roosevelt greeted her tenderly, told her of his coming journey, and promised to call on her on his return. She expressed, in a pathetic way, natural anxiety for his safety, but was reassured by his evident confidence in a happy outcome.

Friends Bidding Ex-President Roosevelt Good-bye on Board the Steamship "Hamburg"

The primary object of Mr. Roosevelt's African expedition is to secure valuable specimens for the Smithsonian Institution in Washington. His refusal to accept an unlimited hunting license from the British authorities shows that his motive is not to indulge a passion for hunting. He will be at liberty, of course, to kill lions and other dangerous animals to any number he pleases; the slaughter of innocuous animals, however, will be confined within the ordinary limits of a sportsman's license.

Ex-President Roosevelt is accompanied on his expedition by three scientists from the Smithsonian Institution and by his son Kermit. Alfred Cunninghame, an Englishman, who is an expert manager of African expeditions, will join the party at Mombasa, Africa. It is reported that F. C. Selous, the famous English explorer and big game hunter, proposes to try his fortune again in the East African jungle about the time that Mr. Roosevelt will be there. The ex-President is fully equipped for a long stay in the jungle. Every possible provision has been made for protection against the perils incident to life in the African wilderness, for success in the hunt and the photographing and preservation of specimens. Mr. Roosevelt is in robust health, and there is no reason to apprehend that his experience in Africa will have an unfavorable effect on his physical condition, accustomed as he is to outdoor exercise and to hunting in the woods and swamps of our American West, and inured to hardships that might break down an ordinary man.

He is now on his way to Naples, Italy, where it is expected that he will stay for a few days, and he may possibly visit the scenes of the recent terrible earthquake. He will then take steamer for Mombasa, British East Africa, to which port his goods are consigned and where the expedition will be organized. Thence he will go toward Masailand, a splendid hunting ground. Part of the way he travels on the Uganda Railway from Mombasa, probably as far as Voi, where he will make his first side trip after big game.

Ex-President Roosevelt carries with him the best wishes of his countrymen and of the civilized world for his well-being and happiness and for his safe return.

THE DIVINE GARDENER ✳ An Easter Sermon by Robert Stuart MacArthur

saved; hosts which no man can number shall enter heaven. The glorious Gospel of the Redeemer shall encircle the globe, and unnumbered millions shall be redeemed by the great salvation. Age after age shall roll on as the Gospel is proclaimed and as multitudes enter heaven.

Jesus Christ is a Patient Gardener. If there be any characteristic of our divine Lord, next to his unspeakable love, that characteristic is his unmeasured patience. Our Lord, as the Divine Gardener and Redeemer, was conspicuous for his patience. Patiently he endured the contradiction of sinners; patiently he was led as a lamb to the slaughter; patiently and heroically he endured the cross and despised the shame. The Heavenly Gardener is often sorely tried by the slow growth of the plants which even the heavenly Father had planted in his vineyard. We often receive the richest supplies of grace apparently in vain. Thus it comes to pass that our beauty is marred and our growth retarded. Our unbelief apparently defeats the plans and purposes of our loving Saviour. How painfully slow is our growth! How fruitless often are our lives! How flowerless are our graces! The patience of the Gardener ought to evoke the gratitude of men as it certainly excites the wonder of angels. This Gardener labors on year after year, seeking fruit, though finding none. He might well cut us off as cumberers of the ground. We have absorbed sunshine and exhausted the forces of the soil, and have still been fruitless. How marvelous is the Gardener's patience! Gently he uses the pruning-knife as he grants us another year's reprieve. His own heart suffers as the pruning-knife wounds. His touch is tender toward the plant as is the hand of a mother in caressing her child. The bruised reed he does not break, and the smoking flax he does not quench.

How patient he was with his erring and blundering disciples! One would suppose that they ought to have understood that he was to die, be buried, and rise from the grave. One would imagine that they would not have so greatly taxed his patience while they listened to his gracious words. Let us not, however, rebuke them while we ourselves are guilty of their faults. Let us rather rejoice that the Divine Gardener is patient with us as he seeks fruit, year after year, from our barren lives. O Divine Gardener, cut us not down as cumberers of the ground, but make us bring forth fruit, some thirty, some sixty, and some an hundred fold.

The church is often a garden enclosed for the heavenly Father's plants. We cannot too strongly emphasize the blessings which the church has conferred upon the world. Many of God's children are neglectful of the obligations and of the privileges of the Church of God. In this respect they greatly err. God's children cannot expect to be happy and useful except they are loyal and loving to their divine Lord and Saviour. The Shepherd cannot protect the sheep except they obey his voice and follow his footsteps. If they wander, they must expect pain and sorrow. Plants cannot be beautiful and fruitful except they receive the personal ministries of the gardener. When Thomas absented himself from the meetings of the disciples he suffered unspeakable loss and brought upon himself unlimited sorrow. Forsaking the assembly of the disciples, he wandered in the gloom and experienced the sorrow of doubt and despair. He had no right to set up the test which he chose to employ before he would give the risen Christ his faith. Not until he came into the presence of Christ and the disciples did he say, "My Lord and my God!" He thus made the highest confession of faith that had been made up to that time. His absence from the assembly of the disciples, and the slowness of his confession, brought upon him Christ's gentle rebuke, "Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed!"

The Heavenly Gardener aims to transform every garden of earth into a Paradise of God. Paradise Lost is to become Paradise Regained. Earth is to be Edenized; every earthly life may become Edenic. The aim of the Divine Gardener is to produce this result. A strange place it was for a tomb, within a garden. We have here a suggestion of all life—the intermingling of opposites. In a garden came Adam's transgression; in a garden the atoning sufferings of Christ were experienced, and in a garden sin and death were buried, and Christ was victorious. In every garden there is a tomb; this is the sad side of life. But around every tomb there may be a garden; this is the joyous side of life. It thus came to pass that the garden in which was Joseph's tomb became prophetic of the Paradise of God. From that tomb came forth a living Saviour, who is to be alive forever more. Joseph's empty tomb proves Bethlehem's holy manger.

The Heavenly Gardener gives us also in the garden around his empty tomb the assurance of our own resurrection. We thus have a personal interest in the flowers of hope, faith and love which bloom under the culture of the Heavenly Gardener in the garden around Christ's empty tomb. These are the flowers blooming in the garden of the Lord. These flowers are prophetic of the Paradise of God in his immediate presence. The grave must one day relax its grasp, and give up those who sleep in its confines. Empty as was Joseph's tomb on the morning of the resurrection, so empty shall be every grave on the last glad Easter morning. Beautiful are these flowers of faith, hope and love which bloom this Easter morning and fill the air with their fragrance. Well may we greet our divine Lord with these flowers of faith and hope. March forth in exultant might, O Jesus Christ, first born from the dead! All hail the resurrection of the Divine Redeemer! Standing in this garden, beside the empty tomb of our Victorious Redeemer and Divine Gardener, we can make the triumphant words of Paul our own, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

SAVE CHINA THROUGH THE CHILDREN

By W. S. HAGQVIST, of Kienchow, Shensi

AS I have returned on furlough to the United States from China for rest and change, after a period of nearly ten years of missionary service, I would take this opportunity to tell your readers about a special work which, through the kind and generous support of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we have been able to undertake, in addition to our ordinary mission duties, namely, orphanage work.

Rev. W. S. Hagqvist

Nearly nine years have passed since the Boxer trouble. This was one of the most terrible anti-Christian persecutions ever known in China, and was precipitated with the intention of stamping out Christianity; but fortunately it was not only unsuccessful, but it helped to show forth the devoted and Christlike spirit of the many martyrs, both foreign and native, who laid down their lives for faith and work. Moreover, it also demonstrated to the world as a whole that Christ's command, "Love thine enemy and reward evil with good," was still observed by his people.

No sooner was it known that these blood-thirsty people were suffering from famine than the Christian people in various lands stretched out their hands to help them, forgetting that these same people had shortly before done their very worst in persecuting and killing their brothers and sisters. Here, as in many other similar cases, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of New York, came nobly to the front. Through its widely read columns the great need was made known, and its readers responded in a most generous manner. Their contributions enabled THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to carry out one of the greatest famine relief undertakings ever known in China. Many of the missionaries who had been driven away by the people, or had to flee from those who wanted to kill them, now came back to these same people during the famine, bringing money and food to relieve them in their sufferings.

I need hardly say that this made a tremendous impression upon the people and bore much good fruit afterward.

Dr. Klopsch saw in this case, as in many others, that there was not only an urgent temporary need, but that something could be done of a permanent and more enduring character than the mere administration of food to the hungry. A great number of children who through this famine were left as orphans were homeless and helpless. To save as many as possible of these THE CHRISTIAN HERALD communicated with different missionaries in China, desiring them to undertake the care of these orphans, for whose support THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was willing to be responsible for a term of five years at least.

I and my fellow-workers of the Scandinavian Alliance Mission, of Chicago, Ill., applied to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the support of one hundred orphans. This application was readily granted, and in July, 1904, we commenced taking in this number of orphans. Our plan was not to start a large orphanage, keeping all the children in one place, but to distribute them among our different mission stations throughout the provinces of Shensi and Kansuh. By this plan our missionaries were able to look after the children while doing their ordinary mission work. Also, by keeping the children in the places where they were known, we were able to give the people who knew them a good object lesson in Christian benevolence.

Many of the poor little orphans we took in had suffered a great deal before they came under our care. Some had been almost starved to death, and it was a difficult problem to get them in good condition again. After all, it is wonderful what love and good care can accomplish in this line.

Our orphanage work in China is attended with a great deal of difficulty and hard work; but the testimony of all our missionaries is, "It is worth doing." It goes without saying that some of the children have not turned out as we had hoped; but a large number have attained a good physique and many have been brought to the saving knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ. One little fellow not only testified for Christ to his relatives, but with joy endured their persecution for refusing to take part in their idol worship. Others have been very helpful by giving a good testimony to the heathen who gather about our mission stations. These people are more apt to take the testimony of a native, yes, even of a child, than of a foreigner. One thing is absolutely certain: these orphans will remain true friends to their benefactors. It would, I am sure, give the kind supporters of these orphans a great thrill of joy if they could hear the warm prayers these children send to the throne of grace in their behalf.

About fifteen of the bigger orphan boys are now in our theological seminary, training for teachers and evangelists. Some of these boys have already shown a marked degree of missionary spirit and zeal, and we earnestly hope and pray that they may be the means of bringing many of their countrymen to Christ.

I firmly believe that the future hope for Christian work in China is the work among the children. A large percentage of the grown-up people are opium slaves, and as such we find them very difficult indeed to reach by the Gospel. Not that we do not believe that God is able to save these poor opium slaves, but it will take a special grace to keep them from this terrible habit. As to the old people, even if their souls get saved, their days of usefulness are largely over. On the other hand, if we can win the children for Christ, we not only gain in each instance a soul for heaven, but also a long, consecrated life of service for the Lord.

It is with great pleasure that I have learned that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has decided to take up the orphanage work in China on a more extended scale. To support two thousand children is no small undertaking, and will be attended with much anxiety and ceaseless activity for those who are to have charge over the work. But with God's help and blessing it will prove a great factor in missionary work in China. It will help to open up the eyes of many who still look upon missionary work with much suspicion. The support and training of orphans, properly conducted, is an infallible means of convincing even the most bigoted Chinese that Christianity is just what it claims to be, "unselfish love." "Ye are the light of the word. . . . Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

From observation made during my eighteen years' experience of missionary work in China I am convinced that the present condition of affairs in that country gives the Church of God such a glorious opportunity for work as it never has had in the past, and may never have again, if the Church fails to use it. The people are waiting for a message from the Christian world. May the Lord help us, as Christians, to take the opportunity to give to the heathen Chinese the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, which is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. That the people are ready to receive the Gospel is clearly demonstrated by the great revivals now going on in the north of China, and also in the southwest, among the aborigines, who are now coming to Christ by thousands. What we now need is more consecrated workers and financial support, together with many sympathetic prayers.

An Easter Opportunity

EASTER! What wonderful opportunities for Christian service were unfolded to the little band of Christians at Jerusalem, at the rolling away of the stone from the sepulchre! Ever since that first glad Easter Day there has been flowing from the empty tomb a constant stream of opportunities for service in the cause of our risen Lord.

What is your opportunity this Easter? There are, indeed, so many that it is difficult to choose. Let us help you to decide by presenting one of the grandest of them all—an opportunity to save a life, a soul. This is the message which has come to us from across the Pacific:

> "Thousands of little Chinese children, buds of promise in God's great garden, must perish unless kind hearts provide the means whereby the blessed 'Water of Life' may be brought to bear upon their lives."

Thousands! Think of it! Thousands of little children, their lives darkened by the shadow of generations of idolatrous ancestors! and they are now waiting, hoping, praying for some one to lead them into the light.

Mrs. Hagqvist and Children

This is your opportunity. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, knowing that many of its readers would respond to this call, has already pledged the support of 2,000 of these children, at a cost of $20 each per year. Write us a postal, addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD China Orphan and Relief Work, Bible House, New York, and we will tell you how you may be of assistance. Do not defer the matter, but grasp the opportunity now.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—THE WORK OF THE Seamen's Christian Association, 399 West Street, New York, has been one of steady growth. Many days the reading room is crowded from 8 A.M. until 10 P.M. with seafaring men. The evening Gospel services are also well attended. Immediately after the recent disaster to the steamship Republic the Seamen's Christian Association offered its help and hospitality to the crew. A concert was given in aid of the rescued crew. The Republic's band, in their uniforms—the only clothing saved from the wreck—were on hand, using the musical instruments loaned by the Baltic, their own having been lost in the wreck.

—MR. W. R. MOODY, son of the late evangelist Dwight L. Moody, discussing the methods of modern evangelism in the columns of a contemporary, writes: "In older days evangelists depended upon the Spirit of God to draw men to hear the Gospel. To prostitute the sacred work of evangelism to the methods of circus and vaudeville was an unheard-of thing. But now the press agent is engaged to supply the secular, as well as the religious, press with highly colored reports of the work. The evangelist is the object of adulation, and only too often the message is less reported than the messenger. But probably the greatest evil in modern evangelism is the spirit of commercialism. As a certain minister recently expressed it, 'evangelism is suffering from the financial microbe.' Evangelists of the older type refused to bargain for their services."

—THE ARMY BRANCH of the Y. M. C. A. of New York has had an excellent year of effort. Its work is located at Forts Wadsworth, Wood, Jay, Schuyler and Slocum. Seventeen young men have united with churches of their choice and five either have entered upon Christian leadership or are preparing to do so. During October and November an average of ten services each Sunday were carried on by these Christian soldiers, preaching in the aggregate to about one thousand persons per Sunday. To carry on the work at Fort Slocum, and the general work in the harbor, necessitates an annual expenditure of about $12,000. All help in the work will be welcomed.

—PROFESSOR ALEXANDER BEERS, principal of the Seattle Seminary, writes: "We have a young man in our college school, a Jew, who has been converted and is taking a great interest in securing an education under Christian influences. He has no means. His name is Samuel Gluxman. One or two of his friends have been induced to come out and visit the school, with a view of entering. There are many Jews in Seattle, and I believe that many of the young people could be induced to attend school in Seattle Seminary and would become Christians and in return do much for their people. The Lord is graciously blessing our work here. Missionaries from our school have gone to all parts of the world."

—MISS MARTHA BERRY, founder and director of the Berry Industrial School, Rome, Ga., writes: "The gift of $12.74 (for the Italian earthquake sufferers) which was sent from the Berry School was all given by the students. They are mountain boys, and have very little money. To give this amount, they worked extra on their half holiday, for which the school paid them. Our work is one of self-sacrifice and faith. It is supported entirely by voluntary contributions."

—THE MOODY BIBLE INSTITUTE, of Chicago, has just celebrated, on "Founder's Day," the seventy-second birthday of D. L. Moody, when its trustees announced that the foundation of a new men's dormitory would soon be laid. This is the first of a group of three new buildings in contemplation, to cost about $350,000, demanded by the growth of the Institute since Mr. Moody's death in 1899. Over half of the last graduating class of the Institute devoted themselves to foreign missionary work.

—HERE IS A HELPFUL THOUGHT, forwarded by Mr. S. B. Nelson, of Barton, Vt. (one of our readers), who takes it from the writings of E. H. Greggs: "Just to be good; to keep life pure from degrading elements; to make it constantly helpful, in little ways, to those who are touched by it; to keep one's spirits always sweet, and avoid all manner of petty anger and irritability—that is an ideal, as noble as it is difficult."

Miss Pamela's Easter Bonnet

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

IT HAD been the custom of Miss Pamela Brent to buy a new bonnet every year in time to be worn on Easter Sunday. On that day Miss Pamela always appeared in church in a gray silk gown that was either new or had been so freshened up that it had an effect of newness. Her gloves, her shoes, every item of her dainty toilet, bespoke studied care at Easter-tide. The neighbors and old friends of Miss Pamela had for so many seasons observed her practice of renovation as to costume that it had finally been taken for granted, and was anticipated precisely as were the birds and flowers that punctually came back to make beautiful the spring.

At other seasons of the year Miss Pamela contentedly wore old clothes, and an irreverent young cousin several degrees removed laughingly asserted that she had seen the same bonnet and cloak on Cousin Pamela at Christmas for the last dozen years. This was probably true. Miss Pamela thought anything good enough for the storm and cold of the winter, but long ago, in her girlhood, she had felt the thrill of romance in the spring, and although all that was left to her of that early dream was a mound in the cemetery, she still liked to dress at Easter in the fresh and dainty fashion as to fabric and tint that had once pleased the eyes of her only lover.

When the village milliner sent to town for her spring orders, they included, as a rule, something rather fine and costly for Pamela Brent. She was now well past sixty, but this made no difference with her in the fastidious delicacy of her annual choice.

When, therefore, April returned and the milliner received no visit of the usual kind from a customer on whom she depended for at least one order, and when, instead of guests coming and going, Miss Pamela drove around in her phaeton quite alone, Phillipsburg began to wonder what had happened. There were hints that Miss Pamela's income had been much reduced by the failure of a bank in New York. One or two of the bolder spirits ventured to put the question to the little gray lawyer who had been Miss Pamela's agent for many years. As well might questions have been asked of a silent statue. Finally, Easter Sunday came, and for the first time in a long life Pamela Brent walked into church in her last year's attire, on which there was not so much as a bow or a flower to indicate the smallest renewal.

She did not, however, come alone. She was accompanied by two persons who sat beside her in the pew, one of them a very old gentleman who carried a gold-headed cane and otherwise looked exceedingly prosperous, and the other a tiny child in a blue gingham frock, a white jacket and a sailor hat. The child sat very close to Miss Pamela during the service, and once or twice the lady's arm was lovingly thrown about her. No one would have been surprised that a child should be seated beside Miss Pamela had there not been a general impression that she took very little interest in children, her visitors having ordinarily been selected from a group of old friends most of whom had now passed the meridian. At several dinner tables on Easter Sunday speculation was rife about the old gentleman and the little girl. Indeed, their advent was as much a theme of conversation as the beauty of the Easter flowers and the charm of the Easter music. Something had happened, evidently. What the something was could not be determined. The young cousin, Marjorie Elmendorf, made up her mind that she would try to find out. After Sunday School, which was held immediately at the close of the morning service, Marjorie had slipped her hand into Cousin Pamela's and had asked her if she might call to see her later in the day. "Come to supper, dear," was the reply. So to supper Marjorie went.

The old gentleman who was seated in an arm-chair by the window rose very courteously when Marjorie entered, and when Miss Pamela presented her to him she recognized his name as that of an aged minister of whom she had heard her father speak. The little girl was not visible. Marjorie looked around hoping that she would see her, but now that she was really in the room she did not quite like to put a direct question. Pamela saved her the trouble. "You wanted to see little Jessie, I am sure," she said quietly. The child is not very strong, and she has had a good deal of excitement and a long journey. She has had her supper and has gone to bed. Poor little dear! If I can only make her happy here with me I shall feel that I have not lived altogether in vain."

"You mean to say," asked Marjorie, "that you have adopted a little girl?" She bit her tongue suddenly, for she was about to add, "at your age." That would have been rude, and in her mind there floated the suggestion that it was a strange time to adopt a child when an elderly lady was supposed to have lost money.

"Yes," answered Pamela, "I have done exactly that. Jessie is the granddaughter of an old schoolmate of mine, and as Dr. Ainslie was coming from the South to visit one or two institutions of learning in the North, he was kind enough to care for her on the way to me. It was all planned some months ago. I discovered almost by accident that Susan Rainsford's granddaughter was in an asylum, and I could not allow that condition to continue. It has all been so beautiful, Marjorie, dear. The child has reached me just in time to let me double my Easter thank-offering. I have been needing somebody to love, somebody to be altogether my own, and God has sent this opportunity to me."

"May I run upstairs and see her?" inquired Marjorie.

"Yes," again replied Miss Pamela. "You will find her in the little room that opens out of mine."

Marjorie was familiar with her cousin's house and went straight to Miss Pamela's own room. She found the little room that opened out of it transformed into a bower of sweetness and cheer. The old paper had been replaced by one that had a pattern of apple blossoms, and the room was green, pink and white. Little Jessie was not asleep. She had on a night-gown trimmed with lace that was a little yellow and had the perfume of lavender. It was not a child's night dress, and Marjorie thought that it had been taken from Miss Pamela's own wardrobe, as indeed it had. She talked a moment or two to Jessie, kissed her and slipped downstairs again, saying to herself, "This accounts for Pamela's forgetting that it was time to buy her Easter bonnet." It did cross her mind, but the thought was at once dismissed, that possibly Pamela was growing modern and was deciding not to inaugurate a change of fashion on Easter day. As she again stepped into the drawing room the old gentleman was taking his leave. She heard him say, "God bless you, dear friend, and give you fourfold for all you have done, and make the rest of your life a continual feast." She came up and said good-by to him, and stood in the background while Pamela accompanied her guest to the door. As, an hour later, they sat at tea together, Marjorie suddenly exclaimed, "Cousin Pamela, I don't want to be intrusive, but have you really lost your money?"

Miss Pamela smiled. "I have perhaps lost something," she said, but I have plenty left. There is no occasion for anybody to worry. What made you inquire?"

"How could I help it? You never at Easter looked the way you did this morning, and somehow you didn't match the flowers, nor the music, and you almost spoiled my enjoyment of Easter. Why in the world should your adopting a little girl have prevented you from buying a new bonnet?"

"To tell the truth," answered Pamela, "I decided a while ago that I was thinking too much about vanities. I mended up my old gloves and had my old shoes repaired and looked at my old bonnet and decided that it would do for another season, and then I sent my Easter offering a little in advance to the headquarters of the society. Then, as I had the opportunity to adopt this dear child, I made an estimate of what it would cost to clothe and educate her, and I have arranged to set aside enough to provide whatever she may need, if God spares her, until she is through college. So, Marjorie, you can see that you will have to bear with a shabby lady for your cousin for this year at least."

"'Cousin Pamela, have you really lost your money?' asked Marjorie"

Marjorie's cheeks grew very pink, and her eyes very bright. "You are a perfect dear," she said, "but you must forgive me if I say, Cousin Pamela, that it looks to me as if you were somehow making a mistake. Won't you tell me truly now who that old gentleman is? I am sure there is a story about him."

"No story, dear child," said Miss Pamela, "except," and her voice sank to a lower tone than usual, "that he is an aged kinsman of the man whom I expected to marry when I was young like you. You know, dear, Robert Sage died suddenly the week before our wedding would have been. We had planned it for Easter week, and I have always kept Easter very sacredly for his sake, as well as for the reason that it is the holiest day in all the year. Yes, I may as well tell you that I have founded a scholarship in Robert's memory, and that his uncle is managing it for me. The business part I mean."

"This is all very lovely," said Marjorie with firmness, "and yet, dear cousin, there is another side. Miss Eldridge will be the poorer if you withdraw your custom from her, and Miss Saunders will not know what to make of it if you never have any more new dresses."

Just then there was an interruption. The door opened softly and a little figure in white with a night-gown trailing on the floor, came shyly in. "I can't go to sleep," said little Jessie, "and I want to come down here and say my prayers. I'm lonesome up there with nobody but God. Please let me stay with you."

Miss Pamela gathered the little thing closely in her arms. "I am not a poor woman," she said, with a smile and a blush as she looked at Marjorie, "and at this minute I believe I am younger than you. I believe, too, that you are right. Something is springing up in my heart that means new life and new love. It is as if something buried long ago has begun to bud and flower. I am going to be fair to everybody, and to-morrow morning you and I, Marjorie, and little Jessie, too, will all of us set about getting our spring wardrobe. Nature puts on fresh clothing at Easter. Why shouldn't we?"

Easter Morn

FROM Christmas until Easter, the progress is swift, and the year marches steadily forward from winter to spring. From day to day the changes are at first imperceptible, but during the six weeks of Lent we begin to see signs and tokens that gladden our hearts and renew in us the joy of youth and hope. To-day, the grass is greener than yesterday; to-morrow the leaves will be like a golden mist upon the trees, so tender and dreamlike is their first beauty; and the day after that the foliage will have deepened in tone to emerald verdure, and everywhere the boughs will wave at the touch of the south wind. "Sweet uncalendered spring rains" fall gently upon the earth in the time of the April showers, and the April sun coaxes a world of fragrant and blooming favorites to smile for us again.

God does not send us strange flowers every year:
When the spring winds blow o'er the pleasant places,
The same dear things lift up the same sweet faces;
The violet is here!

Yes, the violet is here, and the trailing arbutus, the daffodil and the lilac. Azaleas, wondrous for whiteness or blushing like the rose, have opened their petals for the splendor of our churches, and hyacinths with spikes of perfume have sprung from the dark bulbs that lately slept under the mould. The orchards are miracles of exquisite grace and loveliness, promises, too, of golden fruit that shall be the summer's pride. Flowers are in bloom and the spring reaches its high-tide of color, scent and form. "The time of the singing of birds has come."

Easter means for us a stronger trust, a higher flight, a braver pinion. Easter spells immortality. We shall carry our flowers to many a grave on Easter morn, but those for whom our tears have dropped are not held in the grave's dark prison. If they were little children, they are safe now, Christ's lambs in the upper fold. If they were sufferers on beds of pain, they are well now, for in heaven the inhabitant shall never say, "I am sick." And if they were mourners here, they are happy there, for God has wiped away all tears from their eyes. All hail, Easter morning, day of triumph, day of joy!

The Sure Foundation

TO those who are living in simple Christian faith and dependence upon God it is a comforting reflection that passing storms and violent perturbations, which seem sometimes to shake the very foundations of the religious world, are not permitted to invade or affright them even in the smallest degree. They have a sure Foundation, an Eternal Hope, against which the forces of doubt and unbelief are impotent. Creeds may come and go, denominations may dissolve and disappear, and the enemies of the Christian religion may outwardly seem to triumph for a time; but these things do not move the soul that is fixed upon God, or bring dismay to the heart in which Christ is ever a welcome guest.

Yet, although he is girded about by a divine aura of protection, the believer is not intolerant. Far from despising any man for his unbelief, he feels for him a brotherly sympathy, knowing the very narrow margin by which he himself may have escaped the bondage of sin and entered into the larger liberty of the kingdom. He knows that no one, unless he resolutely puts aside all obstacles and takes hold of the truth as it is in Jesus, with the simple faith of a child, can make appreciable progress in the Christian life. He knows how the alluring highway of intellectuality may lead us far from the object we seek, and that the first essential is faith in God, who must be taken at his word. Not till we place our whole lives in the Divine care are we able to understand the Gospel's saving, keeping, comforting and uplifting power. Until Christ enters the heart it can never know the joy that comes of confessing him before men nor the blessing that follows. It is just the difference between the unawakened life of this world, "dead in trespasses and sins," and the revitalized life of the soul under the divine touch.

Our churches to-day need to go back to Calvary. They need to get new inspiration at the foot of the cross, and at the entrance to the riven tomb. They need to pray the Holy Spirit back into the Church, whose teaching will bring reinforcement to pulpit and pew, and energize and sanctify the whole. Then there will be no complaints that the right message is missing—not a message of "negations, doubts, denials and rejections," but one that is full of power to convert the soul and transform the life.

Not the least of the blessings that fall to the lot of the humble believer is immunity from disturbance and doubt amid the tempestuous assaults on religion. With him, doubts and fears flee away as clouds before the sunshine. Dr. Robertson Nicoll thus describes the tranquillity of the believer:

These are they for whom the inward solitude of the soul is ended, who have Christ within them, the Hope of Glory. For them the deeps are held back from overwhelming; for them the promises have been fulfilled, and they have had lack of nothing. They have found in Christ an answer to the spirit's sorest need. They know the power of prevailing prayer. They know that the Divine Personality supplies all the wants of the creatures he has redeemed. Nor do they fear for the life and progress of the Church. There are signs which make them sure of the future of that Church which is the Kingdom of the Eternal Son, ruled by himself, ministered unto by angels, holding within its fellowship the living and the dead.

Surely the problems of faith are infinitesimal, if we contrast them with the "difficulties of unbelief." And to all of these Jesus Christ is the great and the only answer.

The Crime of Kidnapping

THERE are few offenses against society so utterly cruel and heartless as kidnapping. No crime on the calendar, short of the actual taking of human life, calls for severer punishment; indeed, in many cases of child abduction, deeper pain and more lasting sorrow are inflicted upon the suffering parents than if the kidnappers' victim had died outright. Crimes of this class have become startlingly frequent of late years, and the recent case of Willie Whitla has aroused public feeling as no case has done since the famous abduction of Charlie Ross, over thirty years ago. Both children were innocent victims of blackmailers; but the arrest of the criminals in the Whitla case, and the restoration of the stolen boy to his parents, furnish a climax in gratifying contrast to the tragic and unsolved mystery of the other case, in which the stolen one was never again heard of and is believed to have met a violent death.

Parents especially will be interested in watching how justice deals with the Sharon kidnappers. The best way to stamp out the crime of child abduction is to let the hand of the law deal swiftly and heavily with the offenders. Their guilt once established, they should be placed where they will be incapable of disturbing the domestic peace of any home for many years to come.

Do Our Sunday Schools Educate?

IN these days of greatly improved methods of Christian work, the question is frequently raised whether the system now in use in a majority of our Sunday Schools has not become antiquated and unserviceable. In a recent article in The Educational Review the writer characterizes our present Sunday School standards as distinctly medieval, leading to a low grade of achievement. He declares that too little time is devoted to the study of the lessons, that they lack continuity, and hop, skip and jump through the Bible, and that the great majority of teachers fail to prepare any lessons at all! He strongly advocates a study period of two or even three hours' duration, and the retention of skilled teachers only. There are other recommendations, but these are the most vital ones.

This is a subject in which the great mass of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers are personally and deeply interested. To those who have children of the Sunday School age, any new departure in the direction of Sunday School improvement is of the first importance. We would be pleased to have any of our readers write us a brief expression of their views. They can write from experience and observation, stating what they consider to be the reforms most urgently needed in Sunday School methods at the present time. A free exchange of ideas on this subject cannot fail to be helpful and may lead to valuable practical results.

The Saloon vs. the Sabbath

THERE are evidences that the whisky traffic, notwithstanding some recent reverses, is still full of fight and is preparing for a vigorous campaign on new lines in several States. It is as full of ambushes and surprises as a Boer general. In New York, it is just beginning a crusade to secure legislation permitting the opening of licensed saloons on certain hours on Sunday. Of course, all the gambling fraternity, the low-class politicians, the dissipated and the drunken, the vicious and the criminal will be the whisky men's allies in this movement.

We are greatly surprised to hear it charged that among those who favor it are some preachers of the Gospel. What can they be thinking about? How can they square their attitude with their duty as Christian pastors? To open the saloons on Sunday means to give Satan free rein in a community and to multiply crime and suffering. More than that, if New York were to let down the bars, it would set an evil example that is sure to be followed in other cities. We trust to see a strong, conservative movement among citizens generally to defeat this attempt to degrade the metropolis and desecrate the Christian Sabbath. Already the Anti-Saloon League has entered its protest and is instituting a vigorous campaign. We should like to see all the temperance and religious organizations standing shoulder to shoulder, in battle line, determined to vindicate the right of Americans to a sober Sunday. To sell the Christian Sabbath to the saloons for a license fee would be throwing away our birthright as a moral, God-fearing, law-abiding people.

A Navy of the Air

GREAT BRITAIN has been greatly agitated over reports that her army was inadequate to defend her interests at a time when her position as a world power seemed seriously threatened by another nation which is striving for commercial and maritime leadership. As a result, all parties have been bending every effort to fill the ranks and to keep the navy up to the famous "two-power standard." Now she is looking to add to her forces on land and sea by starting an aerial navy. The king visited the Wright Brothers in France, and was impressed by their wonderful flying machines, and now the British Government is negotiating with the daring inventors. A few years ago these young men were considered to be wasting their time on the impossible. Now the governments of the world are endeavoring to secure their assistance. This is evidently one of the rare cases where the inventive mind is to reap the reward of its labors, instead of dying in poverty and leaving the invention to be exploited by some one who only furnished the money for its development.

Kidnapped Boy Returned

WILLIE WHITLA, an eight-year-old lad of Sharon, Pa., went to school as usual one day lately, when a man rode to the schoolhouse in a buggy and told the janitor that he had been sent for the boy. The teacher fixed the little fellow up, and he was driven away. The boy not returning, and the facts being discovered, set the parents well-nigh crazy, and every possible effort was used to find the little fellow. At last the father received a letter demanding a ransom of $10,000 for his return. On March 22 the boy walked into the Hollenden Hotel in Cleveland, O., where his father had been waiting for him for several hours. "My boy!" he cried, tears streaming from his eyes as he grasped his son in his arms and rushed up the stairway to the room which he had in waiting. The little fellow told his father that he was carried in a buggy to Warren, and then went to Newcastle and Ashtabula, O. He said he was treated pretty well, but that at first, and while he was a captive, they gave him candy which put him to sleep, thus preventing, of course, outcries and detection. One night he slept between two men, who told him he was in a hospital, sick, and that he must not make any noise or he would disturb the other patients; that if he cried and made any fuss, they would put him in a bed with a smallpox patient and that he would catch the disease and die. The reunion of father and son, frustrated in Ashtabula, was accomplished by heeding this letter, sent to Sharon:

"A mistake was made at Ashtabula Saturday night. Come to Cleveland on the Erie train, leaving Youngstown at 11:10 A.M. Leave the train at Wilson Avenue, take a car to Wilson and St. Clair. At Dunbar's drug store you will find a letter addressed to William Williams. We will not write you again on this matter. If you attempt to catch us, you will never see your boy again."

Following these instructions, Whitla paid the $10,000 ransom in a confectionery store, to which he had been directed in the letter received at the drug store. In the candy store he met a woman. He asked only one question: "Is my boy well?" "He is all right," replied the woman. Then the money passed, and he went to the hotel, where his son was brought to him. The mother was wild with delight at the news, and it is said that the boy, over the 'phone, said: "Ma, are you going to have any lemon pie to-day? I haven't had any since I left home."

It was sheer wicked avarice, the source of so many evils, that led to the kidnapping. Three of the kidnappers have been arrested and the bulk of the money has been recovered. The intolerable agony of the parents at the loss of the boy was pitiable in the extreme, and their joy at his return correspondingly glorious. Boys and girls in great numbers are kidnapped by the vices of the saloon, the gambling den and evil company, causing intolerable agony to loved ones; and there is supreme joy to parents when the children are returned from their captivity safe and unharmed.

For this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found. (Luke 15 : 24.)

The Baby Pianist

Of the many musical prodigies that have astonished the world, few have equaled Pilar Osorio, who, three years of age, plays the piano like a master. She is the daughter of a Spanish doctor who lives at Charlottenburg, and is half-sister of Pepito Arriola, who created something of a sensation in London some months ago. The child's talent first showed itself when, hearing a maid singing, she went to the piano and played the tune. She does not know a note and plays by ear. Her technique is described as excellent. The remarkable nature of her talents has interested not only musicians, but many scientists. The making of a great musician requires not only the musical instinct, but the most constant and painstaking practice. If this child shall be spared, and acquire habits of industry, she may yet become known as one of the great artists of the time.

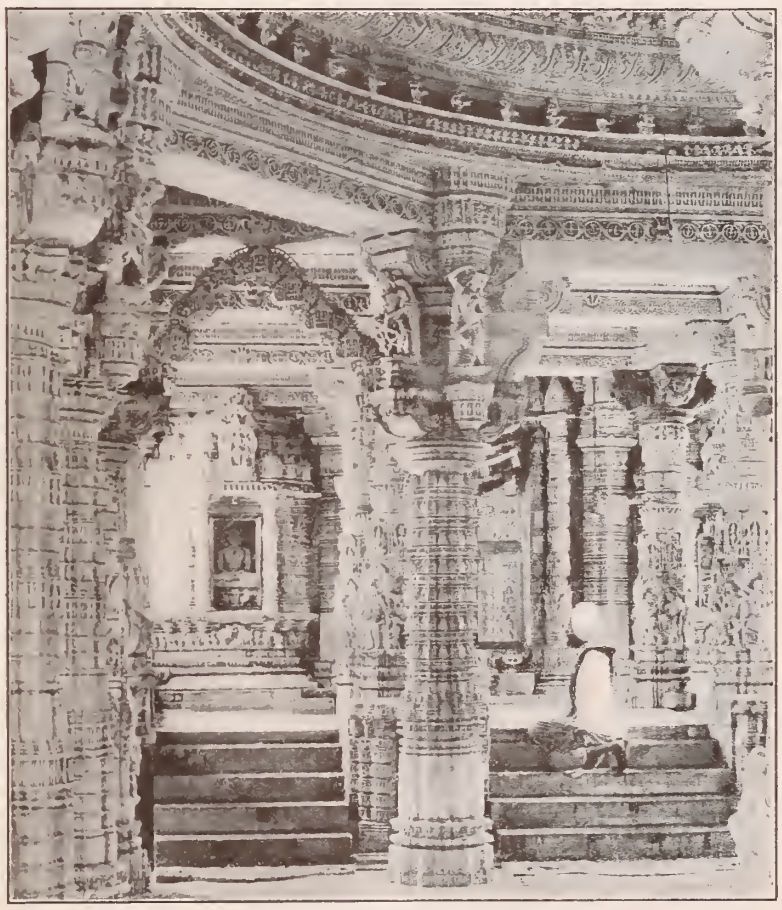
And David spake to the chief of the Levites to appoint their brethren to be the singers with instruments of music, psalteries and harps and cymbals, sounding, by lifting up the voice with joy. (I. Chron. 15:16.)

A Girl Receives a Congressional Medal

At the burning of the General Slocum, five years ago, in which more than a thousand precious lives were sacrificed, there were acts of cowardice, but many of genuine heroism. Little Mary McCann, a girl of fourteen, was a scarlet fever convalescent on North Brother Island when the Slocum, afire, grounded there. She waded and swam into the river and carried ashore nine children, who jumped or were thrown from the blazing steamer. On the tenth trip she collapsed, and had to be rescued herself.

Her heroism was so marked that Congress, some four years ago, voted her a medal for her bravery. She did not hear of this act of Congress until recently, and she was then summoned to Washington, where Speaker Cannon made a complimentary presentation speech, at the close of which he placed his hands upon her cheeks and planted a hearty and audible kiss upon her fair face. The onlookers cheered and applauded, and it was several minutes later before the Speaker recovered composure enough to go on with the legislative business at hand. Miss McCann is soon to graduate as a professional nurse from the Crittenden Training School, of New York City. Congress did wisely to vote this medal, and the beautiful act of this girl ought to be an inspiration to the young, and old as well, to a life of unselfishness and bravery. There are so many perishing in the fires of appetite and in the waters of moral evil that there is the loudest call to those who are able to rescue the unfortunate from peril.

Be strong and of a good courage. (Josh. 1 : 6.)



The Wonderful Jain Temple on Mount Abu, Rajputana, India

A Magnificent Jain Temple

In the southern part of Hindustan there is a heterodox sect of Hindus called Jainas. Their name signifies followers of Jaina, the generic name of deified saints. Some of the articles of their faith are similar to those of the Buddhists, but others are like those of Brahmanism. They deny the authority of the Vedas. One of the greatest temples of the world is one of the Jainas on Mount Abu, in Rajputana, which is a perfect gem of Indian architecture, and in its deep and rich carvings of white marble is a miracle of elaboration. The Jainas themselves claim that their religion is eternal, and that in olden times the whole of India was under its sway; but the origin of the sect is placed by the pen of history at between five and six hundred years before Christ. These people live a remote and contemplative life and carry the horror of taking life to an extreme point. They tolerate and encourage the most pestiferous insects, and would rather die than destroy creatures discoverable only with the microscope. Some wear nettings over their mouths to save insects from destruction, and carry little brooms to sweep even invisible microbes from the places where they desire to sit down, so fearful are they of taking any kind of animal life. If these people are so devoted to their religion, make such contributions of their means and themselves to error which they believe to be true, and can build such splendid monuments to their faith, how much more devoted ought we to be to our religion of truth, and how prodigal we should be in our money and ourselves for the support of the Church of Jesus Christ and for the spread of his truth to the benighted nations of the earth!

The Moon's Influence on the Earth

From observations made at the Potsdam Observatory by the astronomer Hecker, it is claimed that the earth twice every day experiences general undulations corresponding to the tides of the ocean. Camille Flammarion caused a sensation in Paris, the other day, by stating that the apparently solid earth, in every twenty-four hours, rises and falls a distance of eight inches. The fact that the attraction of the moon, which causes periodic movements in the liquid oceans, also produces a similar effect on the solid crust of the earth has been believed by men of science for years. Sir George Darwin, son of Charles Darwin, in an address before the Authors' Club of London recently, said that for more than twenty-five years he and his brother Horace have been making a series of experiments, with a view to computing the yield of the earth to tidal forces. He rejoiced in Dr. Hecker's successful experiment, and, among other things, said: "His apparatus is in a chamber cut out of the side of a well, at eighty feet below the earth's surface, and he has had observations by means of photography, day and night, for six years. It is from these observations that it is possible to determine how stiff the earth is, and we find it to be just about as stiff as if it were made of steel throughout. The amount of vertical rise and fall can be inferred from Dr. Hecker's observations."

In this wonderful period of scientific investigation, we are led from one marvelous discovery to another in rapid succession, and art makes practical use of each scientific discovery. If atoms of dead matter exert such influence over each other, if the moon lays hold upon the seas and the land with such a tremendous grip, what must be our reverence for the Great Being who created the earth and the sun and the moon, and who supplies them with the energy they exert! And how close to Christ, the true magnet of love, we should be, that we may influence others and draw them to him!

And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me. (John 12 : 32.)

THE SOUTH POLE ALMOST REACHED

IMPORTANT news comes by the cable from New Zealand to the effect that the Shackleton expedition to the South Pole has returned to Invercargill (N. Z.), after a most arduous but successful journey, during which all previous polar research records were eclipsed. The expedition reached a point 111 miles distant from the South Pole, or 354 miles nearer to it than the previous expedition in the Discovery.

Lieutenant Shackleton and party sailed in the stanch steamer Nimrod, from England, in July, 1907, for New Zealand, whence the exploring expedition was to start on its adventurous journey. On his arrival in the latter country, no time was lost in completing preparations. A specially constructed motor car for dragging sledges over flat ice was put on board, and a number of Manchurian ponies and Siberian dogs were added to the equipment. There was also a wooden shelter lined with felt and granulated cork as a refuge for the explorers during the winter darkness. The explorers said good-by to civilization, and the Nimrod with its crew of twenty men sailed for the unknown. It was arranged that she should carry the twelve explorers to some suitable camping place as far south as possible, leave them there and return, to go back for them early next year. She put them ashore at a point about eight hundred miles from the South Pole.

The Antarctic Exploring Steamship "Nimrod"

Lieutenant Shackleton himself, in a long cable dispatch, tells what happened afterward. He writes that the most southerly point reached was latitude 88 degrees 23 minutes, longitude east 162 degrees, or 111 miles from the pole itself. The journey was very difficult. After crossing several mountains, they reached a plateau 10,000 feet high. The distance traveled was 1,708 miles, and the time occupied 126 days. In all, more than 100 new mountain peaks were discovered. All felt the hardships of the journey severely. Good zoological discoveries were made, and important sledge journeys were undertaken west and north.

The south magnetic pole was reached in latitude 72 degrees 25 minutes, longitude 154 degrees. The winter was mild, and the lowest temperature encountered was 40 degrees below zero, Fahrenheit. The geological results of the expedition are as important as the zoological.

Mount Erebus, the southernmost volcano in the world, 13,200 feet high, was ascended for the first time. The active crater is half a mile across and 8,000 feet deep. It was ejecting volumes of steam and sulphurous gas to a height of 2,000 feet.

The geographical pole is believed to be situated on a plateau 10,000 to 11,000 feet above sea level. Violent blizzards in latitude 88 dispel the idea of a polar calm, which, if it exists at all, must be small in area.

In the "dash for the pole," which began October 29, 1908, a party of eight participated. They traveled south over high ridges and mounds of snow, the ponies often sinking up to their bellies. On November 26 the ponies were attacked by snow blindness. Three of them had to be shot by November 30. On December 2 they found the ridges of snow and ice turned into land, with here and there enormous glaciers and great yawning crevasses. One glacier was 120 miles long and 40 wide, and full of crevasses, but they traversed it, fighting their way along with great difficulty. On December 7 a pony dropped into an apparently fathomless crevasse, but the sledge and driver were saved.

After incredible hardships and in the face of constant danger of sudden death, they began, on January 1, to think of returning. They had seen more mountain ranges beyond, but a blizzard set in January 7 and raged three days, with wind blowing seventy miles an hour and temperature showing 72 degrees of frost. Several members of the party were frost-bitten in their sleeping-bags. On January 9 they reached latitude 82 degrees 23 minutes and longitude 162 east, the most southerly point ever reached by man. Here they hoisted the British flag. Food having given out, they were compelled to return. The entire party was prostrated on February 4 with dysentery. One of the men (Marshall) was so ill that he had to be left in a shelter in charge of another, while the main party returned to the starting point for relief. All reached Hut Point safely on March 4, after an absence of 126 days, the only loss being four ponies.

Lieutenant Shackleton reports that the chief vegetation of the Antarctic consisted of large sheets of fungus-like plants, many lichens, and a few mosses. There was an abundance of seaweed. The aurora borealis displays throughout the winter were exceedingly brilliant. The lowest temperature was 88 degrees below freezing. The barrier surface was found impracticable for the motor sledge.

Had the Shackleton expedition reached the South Pole, a dream of navigators which inspired many earlier and futile attempts would have been realized. The farthest point south heretofore reached was 70 degrees 50 minutes, where Borchgrevink, a Norwegian explorer, arrived on March 17, 1900. The magnetic position of the South Pole had been fixed at about latitude 73 degrees 20 minutes south and 146 east.

New York's Coming Gospel Campaign

THE inauguration of the fifth season of New York's Tent, Open-Air and Shop Gospel Campaign is at hand.

Rev. J. S. Holden

Superintendent Dr. Arthur J. Smith and Assistant Superintendent Mr. Orin C. Baker have both been unanimously re-elected for another year. It is the intention of the Evangelistic Committee to enlarge the scope of its work this season to include meetings on the docks and at the forts, in the prisons and hospitals. Special meetings will be held for business men, for working men and women, for big boys and for children, for soldiers and sailors, conducted in English or in foreign languages, and adapted to the various localities.

Thirty-six centres were covered last year. More open-air centres will be in operation this year, in which laymen will be used, and there will be a larger number of services in foreign languages. General work will begin about the middle of June.

Rev. Dr. John Stuart Holden, rector of St. Paul's Church, London, now visiting in America, is taking an active interest in the committee's work. He is one of the busiest clergymen in London, an enthusiastic evangelist, a powerful speaker, forceful, sympathetic and winning, and has already made a deep impression upon many in this country who have heard him speak at Northfield and elsewhere.

St. Louis Stirred by a Revival

ST. LOUIS has experienced a great spiritual awakening. Gipsy Smith, the English evangelist, stormed the battlements of sin in eighteen days' meetings, conducted at the Coliseum. He had a strong and willing corps of assistants, who did the preparatory work. The meetings began on January 24, since which time some 4,000 have made profession of faith in Christ as Saviour. The interest has radiated into every church associated in the movement, instilling new life in lukewarm members. As a result, revivals have begun in the churches, so that the work will be supplemented by a harvest of new members.

St. Louis is gratified, too, at the knowledge that Gipsy Smith is coming back next year. The great choir of 3,000 voices, which has done such good work during the recent meetings, will remain an organized body until he returns.

Before his departure the evangelist was presented with a loving cup, given by the allied ministers, whose support he so valued. On one side of the cup was engraved, "Gipsy Smith, a Man Sent from God." On another side, "The Gipsy Smith Coliseum Meeting, January 24, 1909, St. Louis, Mo." On still another side was engraved, "Presented by the Ministers Co-operating in the Mission, February 5, 1909." A silver cake basket was presented by the choir. There was a gift from the ministers to Mrs. Smith, who accompanies her husband, and always sits behind him on the rostrum. It was a silver cake plate.

Gipsy Smith told his life-story on Monday night, February 8, to as many people as the Coliseum could possibly seat. His was the pathetic tale of a little heathen boy, who, touched by the song his mother sang on her deathbed, found his way to the Saviour and then to mankind. An illiterate nomad, he became a consecrated preacher of the Gospel.

When he left St. Louis, February 10, a throng gathered at the Union Station to bid him good-by. His influence in St. Louis was shown by the way his friends rallied round him at the parting of the ways. His return will be hailed with joy.

ROY CARTER.

Worth a Careful Reading

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The book, The Inside Story of the White House, I find very interesting, and well worth a thorough reading.

IMMIGRATION'S RETURNING TIDE

Italian Immigrants Gazing at the Wonderful "Sky-Scraper" Buildings of New York, as the Steamer Approaches the City

NO sooner do the rays of the spring sun break the buds of the trees on Staten Island and the birds appear in Central Park than, as another harbinger of warm weather, the tide of immigration through the Narrows of New York harbor increases from its comparatively scant winter numbers until people from Europe and the Orient are knocking at the gates of Ellis Island by the tens of thousands.

Last year there was a falling off in the number, which might have been expected. The "Wall Street panic," which affected business throughout the country, closed down many shops and threw numbers out of work. Quickly the word went back to the Old World from the New that hard times were expected and those who had planned to seek their fortunes in America had best stay under the old rooftree for a season until things were on a more prosperous basis. In fact, there was quite a stream of emigration from this country, many who were out of work returning to settle permanently in their native lands or taking advantage of the time when work was slack to go back for a visit to the relatives they had left at home.

Now, with returning prosperity, the steerages of the great ocean liners are filled with people from Italy, Hungary, Poland, and even farther East, who have heard that there is a revival of business and have carried out their long-cherished plan of starting life here anew. Southern Italy and Sicily, as a result of the Messina earthquake, are sending more than their usual quota, and it would seem as if this might be called "the Italian year of immigration." They began to come within three weeks after the disaster, while the soldiers were still searching in the ruins, and they have been coming in increasing numbers ever since.

On Friday, the 19th of March, seven great liners poked their noses through the Narrows. Crowding to the rails and gazing in open-eyed and open-mouthed astonishment were ten thousand immigrants, the largest number that has come in during any one day for the last two years. The great majority showed by their vivacious gestures and dark skins, gaudy shawls and display of ornaments, that they were from Italy. Next in number were the Jews. There were so many that Ellis Island would have been overcrowded, and part were not landed until the next day. Most of the immigrants were from Mediterranean ports, but there were some from the Emerald Isle and a few from Norway and Sweden. These kept well to themselves, looking askance at the swarthy faces of those who had come in from the more southerly climes. Most of those from Northern countries know exactly where they are going, and frequently have tucked away in a large leather pouch the hard-earned sum which will be the first payment of the farm they hope to own in the Northwest. Since the murder of brave Lieutenant Petrosino, those arriving from South Italy are very carefully watched, in order to reduce as much as possible the inflow of criminals. Only detectives of their own nationality are of much avail for this service, and a dangerous service it is. As the spectator sees the heterogeneous crowds pour through the gates he cannot but feel that it were better to have the sifting done at the ports of embarkation, as has sometimes been suggested. It is to be hoped that the examination at New York may be strict enough to reduce the number of those who are likely to become unworthy citizens of the United States. Much is still to be done to improve this process of sifting, and it is a subject of the utmost importance to every patriotic American.

MOTHERS AND SONS

TO the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: The question has been raised in your columns whether the large amount of vice among men is not the fault of their mothers, and a proof that women are unworthy to vote. On this point I should like to quote the opinion of a famous mother in Israel, the late Mrs. Zerelda G. Wallace, from whom General Lew Wallace said that he drew the portrait of the mother in Ben-Hur. To the women who think they have all the rights they want, Mrs. Wallace said:

"Do you forget the 200,000 licensed schools of vice in our country? Do you realize that this makes your door-yard fence the dead-line beyond which your boy passes only at the peril of his soul?"

To the men who say that it is woman's special work to bring up children, she said:

"To do successfully that part of the work of the world which is given to us, we must have a voice in making the conditions that surround us while we do that work. To deprive woman of the right to express her thought with authority at the ballot-box puts a mark of imbecility upon her at once. So far as the government is concerned, we are held in perpetual tutelage—we are minors always.

"Think of the effect of this dishonor upon the boys of the land. The mother tries to teach her boy that he must be pure and temperate and honorable, that he must control his passions, and walk as a man among men, if he would succeed in life. That boy goes out from his mother, and the first thing he meets with neutralizes and gives the lie to all his mother's teachings. He says to himself, 'Why, mother says so and so'; but he finds men in high places violating all those teachings, and he begins to conclude that his mother does not know much about it. From that moment that boy discounts his mother's judgment, and though she must still have a hold on his affections she does not have a hold upon him in any other way. There is where you wrong us, gentlemen, and cripple us in training men who will make the statesmen of this nation. If you want us to make statesmen, you must give the women an interest in the government, and you must count their opinions."

Many mothers succeed in bringing up good sons in spite of these difficulties, but they do their work at an unfair disadvantage while they have no voice in shaping the environment of their homes. Too often a bad environment neutralizes the best efforts of a good mother. EMILY J. GRAHAM.

AN EASTER LILY

By EMMA S. ALLEN

THE usual sunny blue of California skies was blotched with sodden rain-clouds, the day before Easter, and the light was so unfavorable for work in the studio, that but few of the students of the Art Institute had braved the incivilities of the storm that promised to play havoc with the fruit blossoms — and the Easter hats.

"I might as well give it up," said Vivian Carroll, laying down her brushes and looking out of the wide windows at the drenched housetops. "Even if there was any inspiration in the weather, there isn't a particle in me. Miss Fairchild, what does ail these eyes?"

Miss Carroll condescended, now and then, to ask questions of the teachers in the Art Institute, realizing that they were indispensable, as mortar, in holding together the bricks she was laying in the foundation of her "career."

Miss Fairchild, with a practiced eye, scrutinized the picture—a copy of The Magdalene, with floating golden hair and supplicating eyes (meant to be sorrowful).

"It is hard to tell what does not ail them," she said. "They lack, first of all, life."

"Yes, I know," said Vivian, quickly. "They're just paint—they don't pray enough. I must study over it until Monday. Perhaps I shall get an inspiration out of the Easter service to-morrow. Now I must go down to the church and see how they are getting along with my design for the decorations."

A cable-car carried her to an imposing pile of sandstone. In front of the handsome church was an express wagon loaded with calla lilies and smilax, from which two or three young men, picturesquely draped with the tangled green and white, were making hasty journeys to the vestibule. They lifted their hats to Vivian, under difficulties, and at the top of the steps two or three others greeted her with the consideration due Judge Carroll's daughter under any circumstances. One of them walked beside her up the broad stairs, carrying her storm paraphernalia proudly, as a page might bear the luggage of a queen, to one of the steam radiators. Then he assisted her out of her mackintosh and she stood before the bevy of young people that flocked about her, dry-shod and beautiful, in her dark-blue tailor suit.

"Now, what have you done?" she asked, with the royal air of an acknowledged leader.

They had done the fundamental part of the work, according to her design, and it only remained for her to point out any defects and add the "finishing touches" of her artistic genius. It took her all the afternoon to do this, and when the beautiful work was completed, the pastor was called from his study to pass judgment.

"It is indeed very beautiful," he exclaimed, standing among the young lambs of his fold, viewing the rose-and-lily garlanded chancel.

"It is Vivian's design," said one of the girls in the group. "She always thinks of something original."

The pastor turned to Vivian:

"It is but a beautiful type, my child," he said, reverently, and lifted his eyes to the words over the sepulchre in the design, wrought in white carnations—

"He is not here, but is risen."

Vivian walked slowly down the aisle, with a hushed, sacred feeling in her soul, thinking of the gentle rebuke, and feeling as though she had committed a sacrilege in designing a floral sepulchre. She fixed her eyes upon the radiant white wings and raiment of the Resurrection Angel in the great cathedral-window over the vestibule, and upon the figure of Mary Magdalene kneeling at the feet of her risen Lord, and thought again of her poor, stranded picture in the studio.

The next instant she was soaring into the future, as she always did when some passing emotion thrilled her. There was nothing small about her ambition to excel in art. It already overtopped every other vocation that woman is heir to. Why should she, who had wealth and talent, sacrifice all for the commonplace privilege of embarking on the treacherous sea of matrimony, exactly as nine hundred and ninety-nine girls out of a thousand were continually doing?

She gave her head an imperious little toss. What had that last absurd thought about "matrimony" to do with her "inspiration," anyway? It was always intruding itself into her thoughts, provokingly—men had such an aggravating way of forcing it into the midst of her exalted meditations, from time to time. The reason it had just frightened her soaring Pegasus and upset her cloud-chariot, spilling her back into the commonplace present, was that Ernest Rodman happened to be standing at the vestibule doors, gazing at her design and—incidentally—at her.

Rodman, she believed, had been created for the sole purpose of putting stumbling-blocks in her path. He really seemed to enjoy seeing her climb over and around the obstacles with which he was continually strewing the highway toward the sky-scraping ambition she was piling up, story after story. True, he had rebelled far less dramatically than other young men against her firm rejection of his enduring affection. He had behaved very well through the ordeal—better, in fact, than she quite relished—and was taking his "settlement" heroically, transferring his attention, sensibly, to more ordinary girls, who were not erecting sky-scrapers. Why, then, should she be putting on her hat and rubbers with fingers that trembled? What was the sense in her heart setting up such a commotion under her trig little Eton jacket, and her face turning as pink as the rose she had pinned on her silk waist?

Rodman at once came over and made friendly overtures toward the warm radiator, pulling off his gloves.

"Vivian with her own hands untied the shabby little shoes from the wayworn feet"

"My stars! but this is stunning!" he exclaimed, looking up at the festooned arches. "Too bad the weather clerk's going to be such an old cad for Easter."

Vivian looked up at him, biting her lower lip, as she always did when reproving him for levity.

"How can you be so irreverent?" she murmured. "Who is the 'weather clerk,' pray?"

He laughed softly, and she smiled up into his handsome face.

"I beg your pardon—I didn't think about that. I'd forgotten that you are too good for me," he muttered.

Vivian turned away with a pout. "Forgotten," so soon, that she had rejected him!

"And you designed it all?" he said.

"Yes. Who told you?"

"One of the girls—I forget which one. They are very proud of you. What are they going to do when you go to Paris and Dresden?"

"Forget me, of course, as you will," she replied. "Good night."

He turned quickly and walked with her to the street.

"Of course I shall never forget you, Vivian," he said in her ear, as his strong arm almost lifted her to the crowded car.

"My darling!"

She flashed a scornful glance upon him, as those two low words sifted through the din of the conductor's bell, then went inside the car with her cheeks blazing and her heart acting very much like the heart of an ordinary girl. How dared he use that impertinent little possessive to her, and how dared she be so ridiculously happy over the sound of it?

She bit her lip in vexation as she took one of the seats vacated for her by four young men, and then rewarded them all with a smile that would have paid them for standing from San Francisco to New York. She did not notice that three of them sat down again, leaving standing unsteadily in the aisle a tawdry, disheveled young woman in a weather-beaten velveteen cape.

When the car stopped to let on a big apoplectic gentleman, the sudden motion half flung the girl into Vivian's lap. She muttered an apology in a hoarse voice, with a defiant glance down at the richly clad figure, and Vivian, with a supercilious scowl on her beautiful face, gathered her silk-lined skirt away from the bedraggled and faded serge.

A harsh, tight cough made her look up, the next instant, to see a face that startled her. It had a strange, wild beauty of its own. A pair of large, dark-brown eyes had in them such a desperate light that they seemed to have burned through the white, pinched face.

The conductor made his way through the car to collect the fares. He turned over the suspicious-looking quarter the girl gave him and then handed it back to her.

"That's no good," he said, brusquely. " 'Twon't pass; it's lead."

"It's all I've got," was the reply, in a tone of cold despair.

"Then you must get off and foot it," and the conductor reached for Vivian's coin.

"Let me off at the corner, please," said Vivian, placidly dropping a nickel in change into her full purse.

A ready hand assisted her down the slippery step, while the conductor hustled the poor, unfortunate girl down the opposite side.

For a moment the girl stood on the flooded pavement, her lips set hard together. She saw Vivian's cardinal silk muffler inside of her costly fur, switched out of its loose knot and blown across the car-track. In an instant it was caught by a cold, ungloved hand and the girl crossed over to Vivian to restore it.

"Thank you," said Vivian, suddenly touched by the forlorn figure. "Dear me, isn't this horrid weather? Have you far to go?"

"Yes; but I don't have to go. The bay isn't so far—and the rain won't matter, under the water."

"Mercy!" gasped Vivian. "What do you mean?"

"I mean—oh, I don't know what I mean—but I wish I was dead," broke from the stony blue lips. "Maybe I will be soon, anyway, if this awful cold I took in the—but I might as well take the short cut, an' make sure. I didn't know my quarter was no good—I thought 'twould take me there—where somebody said I'd find a friend; I told him I had enough money to take me—when he asked me if I had any."

There was a hoarse sob, a stifling cough, as the girl bent her head and turned to go.

"Stop," cried Vivian, clutching the old cape. "There will be another car in a few minutes," and she fumbled in her purse. "Here, take this, please. It was cruel of the conductor to put you off."

The girl drew back stiffly.

"No, thank you. You heard him tell me I had to get off—and you let me. Keep your money, now," she said.

"Yes, I know—and I'm ashamed of myself for not helping you then," faltered Vivian. "But please take it, now, and never mind the change."

She pressed a half-dollar into the cold hand, but the girl looked stonily untouched.

"It don't matter—it'll only stave it off a day or two."

Vivian was holding her umbrella over both their heads now, and looking into the fierce, hungry eyes questioningly.

"Is there—some trouble?" she asked, as a child might.

"Trouble!" muttered the girl. "What do you know of that word, beside how to spell it? You live there?"

"Yes," answered Vivian. "But even there I have known trouble and sorrow—when my darling mother died. Won't you—won't you come in with me—and get warm?"

She took the arm of the shivering girl as though it were that of her dearest friend, and led her through the gate.

"Oh, I oughtn't to," murmured the poor girl, drawing back at the open door. "They won't like it—and I'm not fit."

"They let me do just as I please," said Vivian, leading the way into the warm hall. A maid took her cloak and rubbers.

"Bring down a pair of stockings and slippers, Elsie, and my red eider-down wrapper," said Vivian. "Dear me, child, your feet are simply soaked!" and with her own hands she untied the shabby little shoes from the wayworn feet.

Vivian unfastened the battered old felt hat from the golden hair. As she did so, the sunny waves tumbled down in a thick mass.

"Oh, how lovely!" she exclaimed. "No, don't twist it up, please. Let it fall all over your shoulders, like that—it's just like—my picture!"

"I—I only had one hair-pin—and my hat-pin did part duty," was the pathetic apology.

Vivian smiled at the brave little scrap of humor and sat down beside her strange guest.

"Oh, it's more beautiful than I ever dreamed!" said the voice beside her. "I've wondered all my life what they could be like on the inside—these fine houses—and late years I've hated 'em. Oh, I tell you I'm not fit to be here."

"I'm glad I asked you. Now, tell me about it, please. It must be the hardest of all trouble, to be so bitterly poor."

Vivian heard a short, harsh laugh that was half a sob.

"Yes," was the answer, "so bitterly poor that you can't afford to be good."

The great, sin-shadowed dark eyes looked full into the stainless blue ones, but Vivian did not shrink away. Instead, she took one of the cold hands in hers. "I want to help you," she said.

Suddenly the defiant eyes filled with tears.

"Oh, I haven't wanted to be wicked," sobbed the voice. "I tell you, you can't dream what our lives are, down in the slums. As long as mother lived, she kept us tolerably good—Tom and me—but after she gave up the terrible fight for bread, against father's whisky, that killed her, we just drifted—Tom to San Quentin for three years, and I just stayed around here, working, no matter where—any place where I could earn a dollar to keep from starving. When I couldn't get it honest, I took it anyway—and I was arrested and sent to jail for three months. Since then, I've been locked up twice for drinkin' too much, when I was treated. But I never heard o' the police lockin' up the men that treated me an' then got mad because I pounded 'em for their insults. I've just come from the police court this afternoon, where the Judge gave me a beautiful little speech about leading a good life—but nothing to buy a dinner with! Do you think you'd 've asked me in here, if you'd known all this?"

Vivian's face was pale with horror of the dreadful life the girl pictured; still, she did not recoil—she was not thinking of her silk-lined skirt now.

"I am so glad I didn't know—and that you are here," she said, gently, threading her fingers through the genuine gold of the beautiful floating hair. She thought, again, of her picture of the Magdalene who had lived nearly two thousand years ago, and as she looked into the sorrowful dark eyes regarding her, she caught the first glimpse of the penitent soul that had so hopelessly eluded her in the studio. The spell of some holy presence seemed to fall upon her, as though the dear Christ himself stood beside the accused, speaking the heavenly words, "Go, and sin no more."

She bowed her face humbly over the cold hand between her soft white ones; she had failed to catch the soul of her picture because she had neglected to seek for it in the living Magdalenes who were sorrowing and dying at her very door.

A sob rose in her throat: "Tell me, dear—where were you going—if you have no home?" she asked.

The hand crept out of Vivian's and helped its mate unfasten a poor little flabby purse from which it took a folded paper.

"It's here—an address. It was my last hope, beside that worthless quarter," said the girl. "A young gentleman gave it to me as I left the courtroom. He tried to defend me—there had to be some one to go through a form—a lawyer, you know. This one was, oh, so kind! He took me to a restaurant and then gave me this address. He said there was an angel there who would help me to do better, if I would go to her—she had helped many poor, friendless girls into the right path. Something in his strong, good face made me hate my wretched life. Read what he wrote, please. I never knew, before, that lawyers had hearts."

Vivian unfolded the aristocratic little scrap of linen parchment. She was thinking of one big, handsome lawyer, who had a mighty heart—the one who was "not good enough for her."

"To the Princess Royal of the King's Daughters:

"My Dear Viola:" she read, with a start, for the capitals M, D and V were strikingly similar to the ones that had headed certain precious little notes to "My Dear Miss Vivian:"—notes recently cremated in the sacrifice to ambition. She glanced to the bottom of the page and saw the initials "E. R.," that could stand for but one person in the world. She read on—

"I send to yóu 'one more unfortunate'— a poor girl just set free from the city prison for the offense of defending herself with fistic skill against the insults of two black scoundrels who ought to be in the penitentiary for sins far deeper than hers. Take her into your blessed haven of refuge and call upon me for anything you may need in the way of funds. Her name is Lily Tabor, poor child!—your 'Easter Lily.'"

Vivian refolded the paper with an almost reverent touch. This, then, was the man she had fancied "not good enough for her"—this up-to-date Good Samaritan whose shoes she was not worthy to unloose.

She put both arms about the girl beside her, and sobbed:

"Forgive me, dear, for pulling my skirt away from you in the car. Forgive me—and then we will ask the blessed Saviour to forgive us both."

"Forgive you? You have never sinned. Oh, I'd love to be good, like you!"

"Dear, it is no credit to me if I am good, for I've always 'fed on the roses and lain in the lilies of life'," said Vivian. "I ought to be far better than I am—as good as this person," tapping the paper softly. "He says your name is Lily."

"Yes," was the bitter reply, "over in the slums they call me 'Tiger Lily'."

"Never mind—that's all past, now, I hope," said Vivian, cheerfully. "He called you an 'Easter Lily'—for tomorrow, you know, is Easter. There is a tradition that says the lilies first bloomed over the Judean plains in the night-time, when the Resurrection angel rolled the stone from the tomb of Christ. And so you may become pure like the lilies."

They sat together in silence, Vivian's heart strangely stirred. Then the girl started up quickly. "I ought to go there, for he said he would telephone to the lady from his office to expect me."

"Then I will go with you, in the carriage; but not until after dinner," said Vivian, as she rose, still holding one hand.

"Now come up to my room and brush your hair."

On the landing, half way up the beautiful staircase, the poor girl sank on her knees and kissed the hem of Vivian's rustling skirt.

"Oh," she said, softly, "it seems like going, up—up into heaven."

Vivian lifted her gently.

"And so you are, dear—into the heaven of a better life, I hope. There! That's my father coming home. I must go and tell him all about it; but you mustn't be afraid of him, for he is an old darling. Here is my room. You may use my brushes and help yourself to my hair-pins until I come back. And here—put on these dry skirts and this waist—and here's a pair of warm shoes—lucky we are so near of a size, Lily."

Vivian left her strange guest bewildered half out of her senses. She brushed the salt drops from her eyes and looked about the beautiful room, then sank on the floor and wept. When Vivian came back, fifteen minutes later, she still knelt there under the veil of her unbrushed hair.

"Oh, I can't touch them beautiful things," came from the quivering lips. "An' why wasn't you afraid I'd steal some of em?"

Vivian laughed softly, as she caught up one of the silver-handled brushes from her dressing-table. "I wasn't afraid of anything but growing selfish again," she said.

"I feel I must brush your hair for you! Sit down here—yes, you must. Papa says it's all right—he knows all about it. You must forgive him for his cheap help in the form of good advice—he was the judge who made the 'beautiful speech.' You won't think hard of him, will you? He was only careless, not cruel. Indeed, he is good—almost as good as Er—I mean, he is just as good as the noble man who wrote that note for you. Papa knows him—and so do I. Do you have any idea who 'Viola' is?"

The girl smiled into the mirror at the rosy face.

"He said she is his cousin, and that she is a 'King's Daughter,' and always wears a little silver cross on her dress. Her husband's a rich merchant, and they have a beautiful home, and she might be a great society lady, but she chooses to give her time and money to the 'rescue work,' as he called it. He said she's helped people to better lives."

Vivian brushed the golden threads gently.

"He is a thousand times too good for me—the King's son—my prince," she said in her heart, the sweet color flooding her face.

A little after seven o'clock Judge Carroll's coachman waited in front of the mansion where the King's Daughter lived. The King's house was all beautiful within, and His Daughter, the Princess Royal, welcomed her poor little wayward guest in His Name.

"I had begun to be worried, my dear, for fear you had missed the way," she said, as she took the feverish hands in hers. "My cousin telephoned that he had directed you to me and told me to ring him up at his rooms this evening and tell him if you got here all right."

She stepped to the telephone beside the staircase.

"Hello! Is that you, Ernest? Well, it's all right. Our little friend has just arrived safely." She listened a moment attentively. How Vivian longed to catch the sound of that distant voice!

"Oh, well, it is all right, now, Ernest. She fell into the hands of another Daughter before she reached me. I wish you would let me tell her, and all the world, how good you are, Mr. Lefthand."

"All right, Ernest—I won't tell. Good-by; and may you have the most joyous Easter of your life!"

When Vivian went back to her carriage, after a blessed half-hour in the Throne-Room of the King himself, she, too, wore the little silver cross bearing the inscription—"In His Name."

The Princess Royal went with her new little sister to the veranda steps, and kissed her good-night.

"I wish I could tell you who my cousin is, dear," she said, "but he forbids my advertising his good works. He is a lawyer, and his profession brings him into close touch with so many who are weak and tempted. He has sent me more than a score of poor unfortunates, young men and women, whom our dear Father has helped me to lead into righteous self-respecting lives. May He bless you, dear, for the 'Lily' you and Ernest brought me for Easter."

Vivian's heart gave a glad little throb—"She and Ernest!"

She laid her burning cheek softly against the lips that had wedded their names, all unconsciously, in that sweet-sounding union.

Easter morning was clear. Ernest Rodman swung himself from a cable-car at the church-corner without much enthusiasm in the day's pageant, although he had carefully arrayed himself in new clothes for the dress-parade, as a matter of course. Over and over in his mind, all night, he had been revolving that grateful wish of the King's Daughter—that this might be "the most joyous Easter of his life."

"And it's the most miserable," he had said to himself in his mirror, as he shaved.

True, he had done a good deed—but what of it? Vivian thought him "irreverent" and "lacking in spirituality" and "not good enough for her."

To his surprise, as he walked out of church, she was waiting for him at the foot of the granite steps.

"Ernest!" she said, softly, as he would have passed her with a mere lifting of his hat.

"Pardon me," he responded, taking a backward step to her side and looking down into her eyes. There was a sweet, shy smile on her flower face—as new to him as the bonny gown and hat—as she said, blushing divinely:

"I'm going to walk home—it's so lovely—and I want you—to come with me—Ernest."

He could scarcely believe his ears.

"Why?" he said, assuming a serene indifference he did not feel. "You know, Vivian, I can never keep up the farce of friendship between us. Yesterday you wanted me to forget you."

"I know—but yesterday wasn't Easter—and I hadn't been resurrected from the grave of my cold, dead selfishness," said Vivian, as they walked away from the crowd. "Oh, Ernest! You're a thousand times too good for me! I deserve nothing better than to starve to death, with pictures and cold marble statues for companions, all the days of my life."

He caught her hand, there in the full glare of noon-day.

"Vivian! what in the dear old planet do you mean?" he demanded, his face turning pale with ecstasy.

"Nothing—much," she faltered, smiling up at him in a way that meant everything in the universe to him. 'Only—oh! it's a long story—it commenced when you put me on the car last night. I'll tell you all about it, when we get home.'

"When we get home?"

He repeated the sweet words tenderly, looking down into the shining blue of her eyes.

"Will it always be 'when we get home,' dearest?" he asked, breathlessly. "We two—together?"

"'Always' is a long while, Ernest," she said, smiling.

"And heaven is a big place, Vivian—it begins right here," and he paused to mark with his foot a square in the white pavement, ere they crossed it together into a lovers' paradise.

"Whatever made you change your mind, my darling?" he asked. All the city might witness his gladness, for aught he cared. Wasn't it "the most joyous Easter of his life"?

She looked up at him through a mist of sudden tears, and laid her finger on the tiny silver cross pinned on the waist of her beautiful gown.

The King's Daughter—the Princess Royal—made me her little sister last night, and gave me this," she said softly, "when the King's Son sent us an 'Easter Lily.' And, oh, Ernest! It's so much more beautiful to live pictures—as Viola does—as you do—than paint them."

At the June exhibition of the Art Institute there was one copy of a famous painting that even the critics pronounced "the gem of the year's work." Before this picture of the Magdalene, on the morning of the gifted young artist's wedding in the beautiful church to which she was going, a bidden guest, Lily Tabor laid a sheaf of snowy callas, and stood for a moment gazing up at the painted face into which her own redeemed soul had been transfixed.

"Bless her! She don't find, anywhere in Europe, a picture that means as much as that one of hers does," she whispered to her glad heart, as she hurried away, with a handful of bride-roses, to the church.

THE ASSASSINATION OF PETROSINO

LIEUT. JOSEPH PETROSINO, of the New York police force, was shot to death recently, in Palermo, Italy. He had in his hand, when he fell, a letter addressed to his wife in New York City. Petrosino was one of the best Italian detectives and one of the bravest officers in the United States, and had gone to Italy in pursuit of dastardly criminals and suffered martyrdom in his fearless discharge of duty. Lieutenant Charles S. Carrao, of the Italian detective squad of New York, an intimate friend of the murdered man, says: "Petrosino was assassinated by Sicilian ex-convicts, whom he caused to be deported after they had arrived in this city. There are in Palermo to-day forty-one men who were forced out of his country by Lieutenant Petrosino because they were ex-convicts. The law gives the authorities the right to deport men convicted of crime in other countries, within three years after reaching here. Petrosino had secret sources of information, and no sooner would a bomb-thrower, blackmailer or cutthroat arrive here from Palermo, or any other town of Sicily, than he would know of it and be on his trail. Petrosino has been responsible for more than a hundred Italian ex-convicts being deported in the last ten years."

This is a shocking ending to so splendid a life. The heroism and loyalty of this man to duty will be a heritage and inspiration to his city, but the criminal influences which he confronted so bravely and before which he fell ought to be reduced and abolished. To this end two things should be done: Our immigration laws should be still further strengthened, so that we could the more certainly bar out the undesirable and vicious elements that come to us from Italy and other countries, and to enable us the better to protect ourselves against the imposition of other governments and of steamship companies, which dump their criminals on our shores to breed anarchy and commit murder. Second, we ought to have a more rigid enforcement of the law. While much is done to check lawlessness and abate crime, the law is not enforced against many forms of crime as rigorously as it should be. We shall not make headway against the "Black Hand" and the worst criminals until there is a better enforcement of law against the ten thousand saloons that breed and foster these criminals that are so difficult to handle. This death, lamentable as it is, will not have been in vain if it shall arouse those entrusted with the administration of authority to a deeper desire and stronger courage to detect and punish crime.

Morning Just Before

A SONG OF EASTER

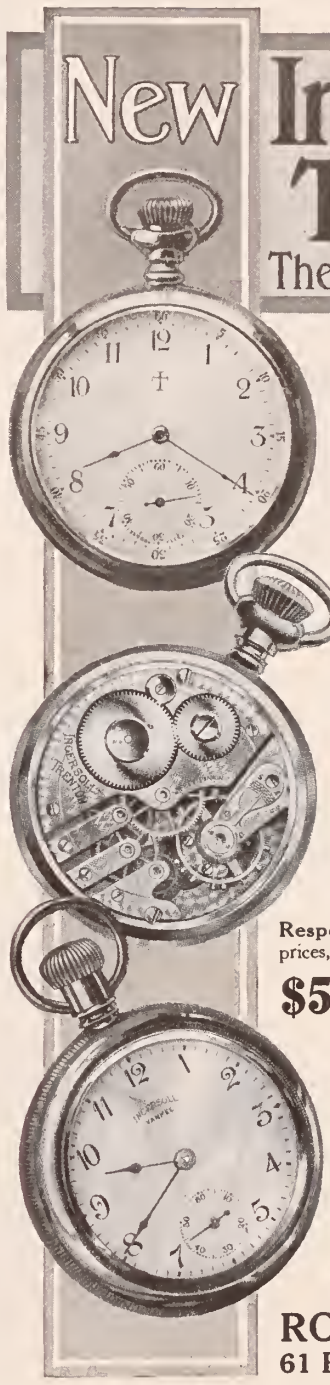
By Arthur Ward

SLOW drifting out, at set of sun,
But not to joyless shore;
For through the curtain of the mist
There's morning just before.

"I know that my Redeemer lives,"
Oh, revelation sweet!
Glad bursts of heavenly minstrelsy
The cadences repeat.

Slow drifting out, my faith is sure,
For on the coming night
The clouds are golden with a glow
Of Easter radiance bright.

Be mine to find that life lives on
Beyond the silent sea!
Peace plays my requiem of rest;
Then—immortality.



New Ingersoll-Trenton $5 $7&$9
The Best Seven Jewel Watch

This new watch, although of entirely different construction and built in another factory, is manufactured by the same concentrated factory-system that made it possible to produce so good a watch as the Ingersoll for $1.

The Ingersoll-Trenton at $5 is in every essential as good a watch as can be made.

The entire "I-T" factory is devoted to making just one model, producing it in enormous quantities at greatly reduced costs, instead of making many grades and sizes—each in relatively small quantities—as other factories do.

This explains how a thoroughly well-made watch like the "I-T" can be sold for so little.

If you think of buying a watch you ought to know the many advantageous features offered in the "I-T." A booklet full of instructive information—sent Free.

Responsible jewelers everywhere sell the "I-T" at the advertised prices, or it will be sent express paid by us on receipt of price.

BIRTHDAY WISHES

Birthday blessings, fullest, sweetest, fall on thee to-day!
Earthly pleasure, fairest, fleetest, will not, cannot stay;
But the true and heavenly treasure cannot pass away;
May its richest, grandest measure gild thy natal day!

Love would strew upon thy way fairest, freshest flowers to-day;
Love would daily, hourly shed, brightest sunbeams on thy head.
So I pray: that heavenly grace be thy flower awakening dew,
And the brightness of His face gild thy life with sunshine true.

Many a happy year be thine, if our Father will:
He has traced the fair design, he will fill it line by line,
Working patiently, until thy completed life shall shine
Glorious in the life devine.

The Love of God the Father, the Grace of God the Son,
The Joy of God the Holy Ghost—a blessing three in one,
Be yours aboundingly, I pray, for this and every coming day.

'Tis the spirit in which we give, not the cost of the gift, that touches the heart of the one who receives. The above is the text of one of the many beautiful silk bookmarks. On heavy satin ribbon, 25 cents each; $2 per dozen postpaid. For a birthday remembrance what could be better?

THE TITLES OF OTHER SILK BOOKMARKS ARE:

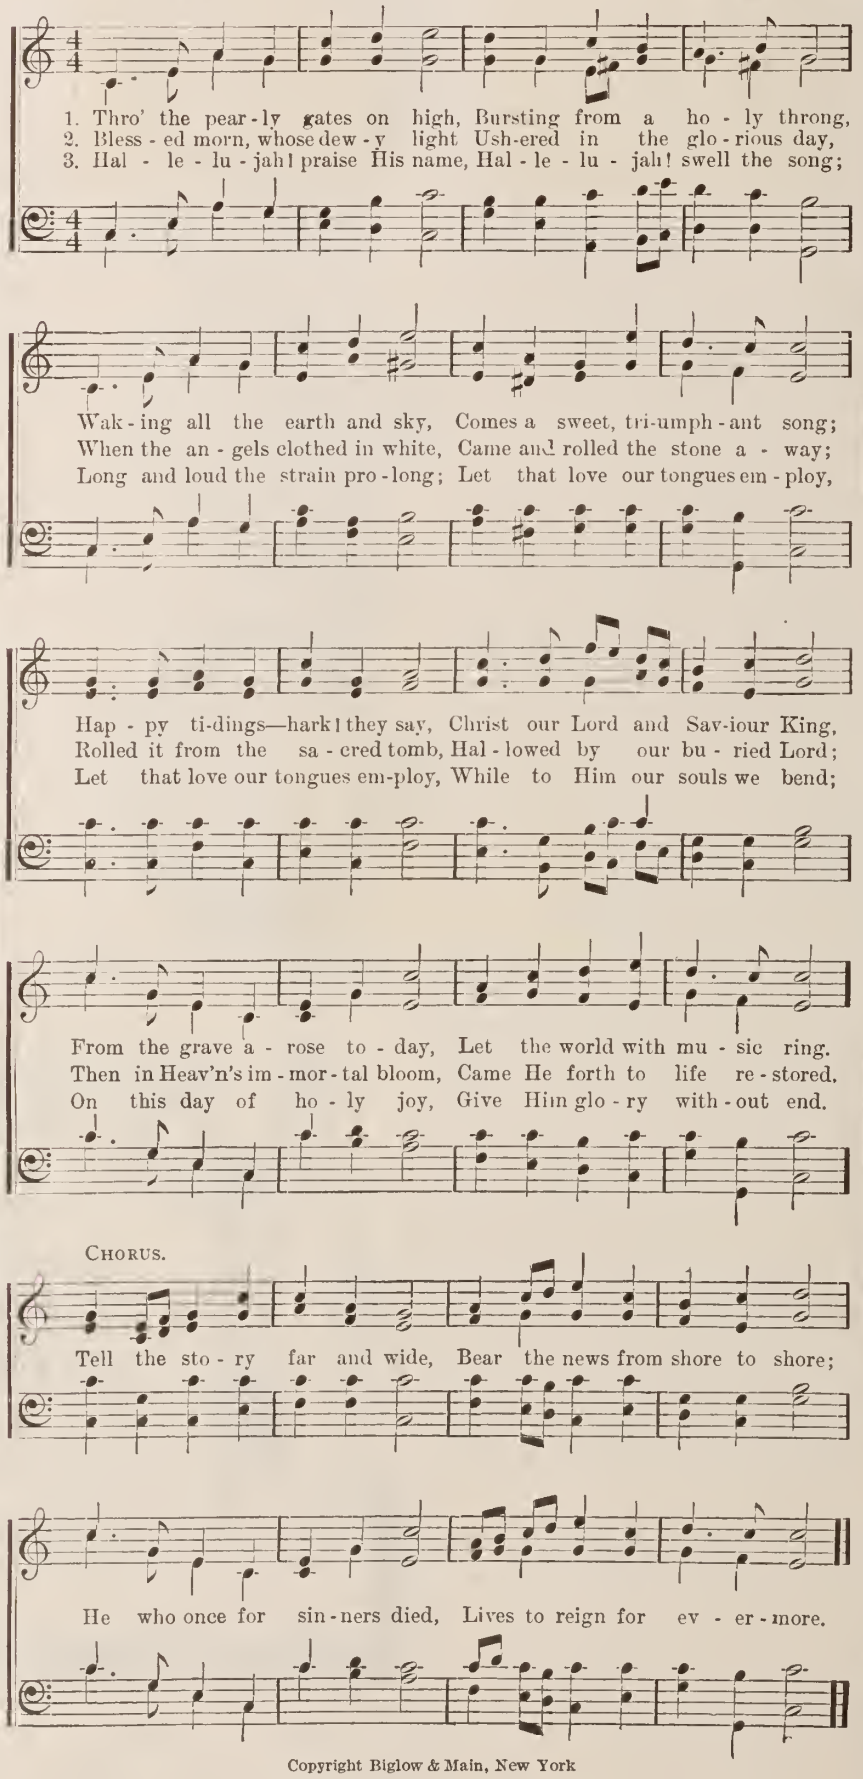
Through the Pearly Gates

An Easter Morning Hymn

Words by Grace J. Francis — Music by H P. Main



1. Thro' the pear-ly gates on high, Bursting from a ho-ly throng,
2. Bless-ed morn, whose dew-y light Ush-ered in the glo-rious day,
3. Hal-le-lu-jah! praise His name, Hal-le-lu-jah! swell the song;
Wak-ing all the earth and sky, Comes a sweet, tri-umph-ant song;
When the an-gels clothed in white, Came and rolled the stone a-way;
Long and loud the strain pro-long; Let that love our tongues em-ploy,
Hap-py ti-dings—hark! they say, Christ our Lord and Sav-iour King,
Rolled it from the sa-cred tomb, Hal-lowed by our bu-ried Lord;
Let that love our tongues em-ploy, While to Him our souls we bend;
From the grave a-rose to-day, Let the world with mu-sic ring.
Then in Heav'n's im-mor-tal bloom, Came He forth to life re-stored,
On this day of ho-ly joy, Give Him glo-ry with-out end.
CHORUS.
Tell the sto-ry far and wide, Bear the news from shore to shore;
He who once for sin-ners died, Lives to reign for ev-er-more.

Music Lessons Free

IN YOUR OWN HOME.

A wonderful offer to every lover of music whether a beginner or an advanced player.

Ninety-six lessons (or a less number, if you desire) for either Piano, Organ, Violin, Guitar, Banjo, Cornet, Sight Singing, or Mandolin will be given free to make our home study courses for these instruments known in your locality. You will get one lesson weekly, and your only expense during the time you take the lessons will be the cost of postage and the music you use, which is small. Write at once. It will mean much to you to get our free booklet. It will place you under no obligation whatever to us if you never write again. You and your friends should know of this work. Hundreds of our pupils write: "Wish I had known of your school before." "Have learned more in one term in my home with your weekly lessons than in three terms with private teachers, and at a great deal less expense." "Everything is so thorough and complete." "The lessons are marvels of simplicity, and my 11 year old boy has not had the least trouble to learn." One minister writes: "As each succeeding lesson comes I am more and more fully persuaded I made no mistake in becoming your pupil."

Established 1898—have thousands of pupils from seven years of age to seventy.

Don't say you cannot learn music till you send for our free booklet and tuition offer. It will be sent by return mail free. Address U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC, Box 7, 225 Fifth Ave., New York City.

Ahmed Riza Pasha

AHMED RIZA is the recently elected Speaker of the new Turkish Parliament in Constantinople. Although the Pasha had been long absent in exile, he was well known to his fellow-countrymen by the work he carried on in Europe to further the interests of the Young Turk Movement, which has recently triumphed. Ahmed Pasha made his headquarters in Paris for a score of years, and was the editor of the Turkish paper called Mecheneret, the English translation being equivalent to "Liberty and Progress."

Soon after the Constitution was declared, Ahmed returned to Constantinople, where he was received by the Young Turks with great enthusiasm. He was elected Speaker by a good majority. His policy is that all parties should now do their best to bring about the union of all elements in the Ottoman Empire so that the country can make real strides toward twentieth-century progress. He would leave undisturbed for the present the traditional institutions of Islam, but would educate the people to the idea that it would be better for all concerned to have a complete separation of the state from any one form of religion and that all religions should be on an equal footing. He is an able speaker and a good disciplinarian.

George Thorndike Angell, known both in Europe and America as "the friend of dumb animals," passed away recently at his home in Boston, at the age of eighty-six. Though he had been ill for some time, he had kept in active touch with the various humane interests of which he was the founder. Mr. Angell was born in Southbridge, Mass. He went to Dartmouth College, in New Hampshire, made a good record as a student and was graduated in 1846. He determined that his life should be devoted to the law, in which he had always had a lively interest, and studied at the Harvard Law School. He was admitted to the active practice of his profession in 1851. It was fifteen years later that he became interested in protecting, in some legal way, helpless dumb animals. He attended a race and saw two horses driven until they dropped dead. He determined to do his best to make such things impossible. Henry Bergh, of New York, had just started the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Fired by his example, Mr. Angell started to publish the magazine Our Dumb Animals. He was one of the founders of the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and was its president and moving spirit for years. The law took a secondary place in his life and he traveled extensively, lecturing and in other ways promoting his humane work. In one year he printed more than 17,000,000 pages of literature on his favorite topic. As a result of his efforts, over 70,000 "Bands of Mercy" were established in America and England. His funeral in Boston was made notable by the number of important men who attended and the public manifestations of respect.

George T. Angell

Major General Barry, of the American Army, shows in his career what may be accomplished by a bright young man who decides early on what is to be his life's work and keeps the object steadily in view until he has attained it.

Thomas Barry was born in the lower part of New York City. He had to go to work after he finished the grammar grade, but studied at the district night school. He early got the idea that he would like to be an army officer. At last he won his appointment, and graduated in the West Point class of 1877. He went into the cavalry as a second lieutenant, then went over to the infantry. He got his captaincy in 1891; in 1897 he became a major. He took part in the war with Spain as a lieutenant-colonel of volunteers, and two years later was a brigadier-general of volunteers.

His service was arduous and varied. He served in the roughest of the fighting of the Philippines, and then went to China with the American troops who went to Pekin to relieve the beleaguered legations. Then he went back to the Philippines and was chief of staff of the division. His ability here as an organizer and administrator excited most favorable comment, and later, when it was necessary to send an army of pacification into Cuba, Barry was the officer selected to command.

Gen. Barry has a number of years to serve, and, judging by his continuous advancement, other honors as well as service are doubtless in store for him. He went abroad to attend the German army maneuvres, and his soldierly bearing and keen insight into the operations was noted by the foreign military attachés. Emperor William several times discussed situations with him. Recently he received his commission as major-general.

Questions and Answers

J. C. G., St. Louis, Mo. How is it that the Lincoln cabin could be dedicated, as recently described in your paper? I supposed it was out of existence. A gentleman in Washington has a piece of a log which he claims he dug up on the site.

The Lincoln log cabin, birthplace of Abraham Lincoln, which is to be surrounded by the Lincoln Memorial, at Hodgenville, Ky., is perfectly authentic. We understand that some of its pieces were once partially removed, but they were preserved and are now restored to their original positions. Probably the person you refer to may have a piece of wood from some other later home of the Lincoln family. A photograph of the birthplace cabin was published in this paper just preceding the date of the Lincoln celebration. There was one other home in which Lincoln lived as a child, which has since disappeared.

R. A. S., Richburg, S. C. When is "the light of the moon," and why is it so called?

Scientifically speaking, "the light of the moon" means the light reflected by the moon. The moon is a non-luminous body, and shines only by the reflected light of the sun. If the expression has any other meaning, it is doubtless a poetical one. S. P. L.

W. B. S., Ishpeming, Mich. In view of the fact that President Taft is a Unitarian, do you believe that our American missionaries in the field will receive the same consideration from the administration that they might expect if the Executive were of some other denomination, say Methodist, Baptist or Presbyterian? Will our missionary interests be protected as zealously and conscientiously as they have been guarded under the two previous administrations? To us, who are giving our whole lives to the work, this is a very serious question.

We have no hesitation in saying that we believe the attitude of President Taft's administration on this question will be all that could be desired. He has traveled much in missionary lands and knows the work as few Americans do, outside of the missionaries themselves. Over and over again, he has given public expression to his high appreciation of that work in India and the Far East. Only the other day, when he met Sir Andrew Fraser, formerly Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces of India and Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, President Taft reiterated his deep interest in mission work and said he would do all he could to further the spread of Christianity.

F. J. B., Addison. 1. When was polygamy first introduced in this country, and by whom? 2. Give some information about Joan of Arc.

1. Polygamy was introduced in this country by the Mormons and was an integral part of the Mormon religion, but in 1890 they agreed to "refrain from contracting any marriage forbidden by the law of the land." In theory, polygamy is still a part of their religion. 2. Joan of Arc was born about 1413, in the little village of Domremy, near Nancy, France. From her thirteenth year she heard voices calling her to deliver France from the English armies. She joined an expedition to carry food into Orleans. Then, as commander, she defeated the besiegers and, as a result, she is sometimes called the "Maid of Orleans." She distinguished herself in several other battles, and the French King was crowned at Rheims. She was captured at Compiegne in May, 1430, by the Burgundians, and sold to the English. She was treated with brutality and tried at Rouen as a sorceress and heretic. She was burned to death May 30, 1431. The Roman Church has recently decreed her canonization as a saint.

E. G. R., Cantril, Ia. 1. Is it right to spend money to buy picture postcards to send to one's friends, such as birthday, Christmas and Easter cards? 2. Please explain Matt. 26:29. 3. What is the exact time between Malachi and the New Testament?

1. Quite right. 2. These words have been a subject of much discussion among commentators, who have differed greatly as to the real meaning, which is often liable to be obscured by an imperfect translation. In the present case, it would seem that the wine is mentioned in a purely symbolic sense. 3. Malachi was contemporary with Nehemiah, and is believed to have lived about 410 B.C.

M. F. L., Evansville, Ind. 1. Which Psalms are called the Penitential Psalms, and which the great historical Psalms? 2. Also explain the meaning of Genesis 3:15.

1. The Penitential Psalms are 6, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130 and 143. The Historical, 78, 105, 106 and 114. 2. "I will permit enmity" is, by many, considered the better rendering. God does not sow the seeds of dissension, but simply withdraws his restraining influence. The passage is a prophetic intimation of the moral state of this earth as a scene of coming conflict between the forces of good and evil.

Mrs. C. G., Newport, R. I. Were there any conversions through Christ while Christ was on earth?

Yes, many, as we learn from the evangelists. See John 2:11; 2:23; 4:39; 4:41; 4:53; 8:31; 11:45; 12:11, and many similar passages. Christ's ministry, however, is not to be estimated by the mere numbers of his converts or those who believed. It was a seed-sowing ministry, the results of which could only be apparent long afterward.

L. M. W., Long Beach, Calif. Have we any missionaries among the Nubians of Africa?

Missionary work among the Nubians, up to a recent date at least, has been confined to occasional visits of colporteurs of the American and British Foreign Bible Societies. German missionaries have operated at Khartoum, where General Gordon did so much to illustrate and commend Christianity. Nubia lies south of Egypt, along the Nile and up to the borders of the Red Sea. The people are Ethiopic, and less than 500,000 in number.

D. W., Kent City, Mich. Please explain Acts 19:2, in which Paul says, "Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed?" and the disciples answer him.

The more accurate translation is, "Did ye receive the Holy Ghost when ye believed?" Something had occurred which led Paul to suspect the imperfection of their spiritual light. They had no communication with any other Christians, and they frankly admitted their ignorance when they said they had not even heard whether the Holy Ghost was given (this, again, is the preferred translation). He saw that they had neither power nor authority, both of which would have come to their ministry had they been "anointed with the Holy Ghost." Therefore he set about to instruct them.

G. W. L., Ohio. I heard a minister preach a sermon recently on "Jacob's Dream." He said Jacob was a notorious trickster and schemer. Is this not a libel on Jacob? Is it right for a minister to select out the darkest side of the lives of Bible characters and present them from the pulpit? This same minister preached on David, and brought out the very worst of his life.

He would be a singular preacher, indeed, and hardly familiar with the lives of the patriarchs, if he could not easily see that the good in them predominated. Possibly, however, you may have misunderstood him. There is no human character without its weakness, and the faults of a man are emphasized by his greatness.

J. M., Detroit, Mich. What proportion of the world's population have had the Gospel preached?

It would be difficult to state figures reliably. In a speech before the recent New England Congregational Congress one of the leaders said, "One thousand millions had not yet heard of Christ," but this we consider excessive.

C. R. E. E., Benkelman, Neb. 1. Write to the Methodist Book Concern, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York City. 2. Acts 2:41, 42 means that they were baptized according to the method then in use, probably immersion, but no one can be positive of this. 3. See MAIL-BAG, page 996 in the December 9, 1908, issue. 4. The Lord's Supper was undoubtedly partaken of at regular, stated intervals, but whether weekly or monthly, or longer, cannot be stated positively.

A "Home Comfort" Stove

Have you solved the "Home Comfort" problem for this coming summer?

Are you planning to put the coal range out of commission?

Will you do the family boiling, stewing and frying in a sane and restful manner over a stove that does not overheat the kitchen?

You can do all this with the

NEW PERFECTION

Wick Blue Flame Oil Cook-Stove

The "New Perfection" is different from all other oil stoves. It has a substantial CABINET TOP like the modern coal range, with a commodious shelf for warming plates and keeping food hot after cooked—also drop shelves on which the coffee pot or teapot may be placed after removing from burner—every convenience, even to bars for holding towels.

Nothing adds more to the pleasure of a summer home than a "New Perfection" Oil Cook-Stove in the kitchen. Made in three sizes. Can be had either with or without Cabinet Top. If not at your dealer's, write our nearest agency.

The Rayo Lamp All that a lamp should be the Rayo is. Well made — ornamental — not easily tipped over — has perfect combustion — greatest volume of light for oil consumed — burns longer with one filling.

If not with your dealer write our nearest agency.

F. L., Capac, Mich. Please explain Luke 14:26, where the Lord requires us to "hate our father and mother, brother and sister," etc., if we would be his disciples. Our pastor claims that our love for Him should be so great that our love even for our own parents, in comparison, would seem hate.

We would refer you to the same passage in Matt. 10:37, 38, where the translators have rendered it in more accurate form: "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me," etc. He claims the supreme affection of his followers and nothing less, and he tells them that earthly ties, however dear, will be slight in comparison with our love for Christ when the crisis comes in which we must decide.

M. M., Germantown, Pa. The recent Jewish Assembly, held in Philadelphia, decided to begin a campaign to prove that this is not a Christian nation from a "constitutional point of view." What does this mean? Why should these people be so resolutely bent on a course which has already been shown to be distasteful to a majority of Americans?

Most people probably had a notion that the opinions of the United States Supreme Court and the Supreme Courts of New York and Pennsylvania, holding that Christianity is part and parcel of the common law of the land, would have been enough to deter any rash intermeddling with that question—for some years to come at least. As Harper's very significantly points out, there are only some 1,777,000 Jews in the United States, or about one Jew for every forty-five Christians. It is rather difficult to understand the object of the persistent contention that this is not a Christian country, in a legal and statutory sense. If there were the slightest cause for complaint on the ground of religious intolerance, the case would be different.

P. R., Mamaroneck, N. Y. Don't delay a good deed till some "suitable season." Do it now. To-day is yours; make what good use of it you can. Here is a little verse which expresses the idea very beautifully:

"We shall do so much in the years to come,
But what have we done to-day?
We shall give our gold in a princely sum,
But what did we give to-day?
We shall lift the heart and dry the tear,
We shall plant a hope in the place of fear,
We shall speak the words of love and cheer,
But what did we speak to-day?"

Jessie V. H., Hamilton, O. What should be the qualifications of a Sabbath School teacher?

A Sunday School teacher should have a personal saving faith in Jesus Christ; a genuine love of souls, and a desire for soul-winning; familiarity with Scripture, and the knowledge how to use Scripture helps, commentaries, encyclopedias and concordance to best advantage in preparing the lesson. Add to these a good education, a pleasing address and a fair stock of patience and energetic determination and you have the ideal qualifications.

J. T. H., Whitehall, Md. 1. Eph. 2:2 speaks of the prince of the power of the air, whom I understand to be Satan. Is he the ruler of cyclones and earthquakes? 2. Has the Gospel been preached to all nations?

1. It has no reference to cyclones and earthquakes, but is to be read as meaning the unseen potentate who disturbs the spiritual course of this world (see II. Cor. 4:4) and whose influence men breathe as they do the air. 2. To all except Tibet, some remote parts of China, portions of Central Asia, the interior of Africa and parts of South America.

I. B. F., Scottdale, Pa. Will you kindly answer in MAIL-BAG if a President, or a member of his Cabinet, could affirm in being sworn in or installed.

The question has never come up, but probably such procedure would be illegal, as the law requires that the President be sworn in and that he take the oath of office.

Mrs. M. E. R., Friendship, N. Y. Please give explanation of "Lamb slain from the foundation of the world."

This passage, which occurs in Rev. 13:8, is taken by commentators to mean, in the original, "written from the foundation of the world in the book of life of the Lamb slain," etc.

Interested, Carthage, Ill. Where are the homes for old soldiers, located in any of the Northern States, east of the Mississippi?

The Connecticut Soldiers' Home, Noroton Heights, Conn.; Illinois Soldiers' Home, Quincy, Ill.; Indiana Soldiers' Home, Lafayette, Ind.; Massachusetts Soldiers' Home, Chelsea, Mass.; Michigan Soldiers' Home, Grand Rapids, Mich.; New Hampshire Soldiers' Home, Tilton, N. H.; New Jersey Soldiers' Home, Vineland, N. J.; New York Soldiers' Home, Bath, N. Y., and Oxford, N. Y.; Ohio Soldiers' Home, Sandusky, O.; Pennsylvania Soldiers' Home, Erie, Pa.; Rhode Island Soldiers' Home, Bristol, R. I.; Vermont Soldiers' Home, Bennington, Vt.; Wisconsin Soldiers' Home, Waupaca, Wis. The above are for volunteer soldiers. There are several others west of the Mississippi. There are national soldiers' homes at Dayton, O.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Togus, Me.; Hampton, Va.; Leavenworth, Kan.; Santa Monica, Calif.; Marion, Ind.; Danville, Ill.; Johnson City, Tenn.; Hot Springs, Ark. The United States Soldiers' Home for soldiers of the regular army is at Washington, D. C.

S. W. R., Guntown, Miss. How did the postal service in the United States originate, and where were stamps first used?

The first general postal service in this country was established by the British Parliament in 1710. At that time an office was opened in London, another in New York and one in each colony. The system was gradually extended, and continued by the United States Government. As early as 1639 a postoffice was established in Boston for "all letters which are brought from beyond the seas, or to be sent thither"; but this was a private enterprise. Postage stamps were first authorized in the United States March 3, 1847.

S. S. C., Salisbury, N. C. I notice the question, Where is the Ark of the Covenant? and you answer that it is an "unsolved mystery" to the Jewish race. But should it be to the Christian? Is it not answered in Rev. 11:19?

The verse referred to indicates, not the earthly temple (mentioned in verse 1) and the material ark itself, but the heavenly antitypes of both.

Mrs. C. M., Armada, Mich. We advise you to let astrologists, necromancers, soothsayers, fortune-tellers and the like severely alone. They are generally clever humbugs, who prey upon the credulous side of human nature and who keep an interested eye on your pocketbook.

Mrs. F. A. B., Haddonfield, N. J. The Emmanuel Movement is yet in its infancy (in the modern sense, at least) and should not, therefore, be subjected to severe criticism, which some seem disposed to give it. Let us wait and not hinder its development. If it be of God, it will make progress and grow apace; if not, it will simply die out, like other ephemeral manifestations. That there are many very worthy Christians connected with it is unquestionable.

H. D. C. V. A., Grand Rapids, Mich., writes: "In your issue of January 6 Mrs. M. E. M., Lebanon, Ky., asks, "What became of Hiram after the building of Solomon's temple?" Hiram, King of Tyre, very materially assisted Solomon, but the Hiram who helped in building the temple was not the King Hiram, but, according to Kitto, a man with the same name, a skilful artificer, knowing all the arts, son of a Tyrian father and a Jewish mother, sent by King Hiram because he bore his name and being half Jew would please King Solomon."

Where Health Is Concerned Why Take Any Chances?

The great weight of scientific opinion throughout the world is hostile to the use of all artificial preservatives in food products, as being in themselves harmful and as making possible the employment of unwholesome materials and unsanitary practices.

Benzoate of Soda is a tasteless, odorless product of coal tar, medicinally used for many diseases. It is a drug, not a food.

A few scientists have announced—after brief experimentation upon healthy young men—that a limited quantity of Benzoate of Soda, administered during the experimental period, caused the subjects of the experiment no apparent injury. This but adds one more opinion on this subject.

There is no evidence anywhere that ordinary people, elderly persons, growing children and those who may have even slight impairment of health, may take indefinite quantities of this drug, or that any one may take it for an indefinite period without danger.

No manufacturer who uses good, sound, fresh raw material, maintains sanitary premises and requires neatness in his work-people, needs to use Benzoate of Soda or any other artificial preservative.

Manufacturers using Benzoate of Soda state its presence upon the labels of their products, because the law compels them to do so—but the statements are always hidden in small type as obscurely placed as possible—a fact which, in itself, is a reflection upon the use of the substance.

The use of any drug with which to embalm the food supply of the country is unnatural, unnecessary and unjustifiable.

Heinz "57 Varieties"—like the products of many other reputable and high class establishments — are prepared without Benzoate of Soda or any other artificial preservative, and may be purchased anywhere with absolute confidence in their purity, goodness and keeping quality.

The public may choose for itself what kind of foods it will eat. If you wish to avoid prepared foods that have been drugged, read all there is printed on every food label.

SINCERITY NOT A SAVIOUR

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

SAUL the Jew. He was an Old Testament man.

He had a high pedigree, being born a Roman citizen.

He was learned, having had for his teacher the great Gamaliel.

He was commissioned as a persecutor of the Christians by the High Priest and Council.

He was blind in judgment through prejudice.

Saul, his Hebrew name.

Paul the Christian. He became a New Testament man.

As a Christian he was born of the Spirit.

The truth as it is in Jesus was revealed to him from heaven.

He was commissioned to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles by the Lord himself.

His eyes were blinded that he might have a clear vision of the soul.

Paul, his Gentile name.

Dr. Joseph Parker says: "Christianity does not oppose Judaism, it supersedes it. Christianity takes up Judaism, realizes all its types and symbols and ceremonies. Judaism is the dawn, Christianity is the full noontide. Christianity is the purple autumn bringing to maturity and sweetness all the roots and fruits of the Judaism which it followed and consummated." Paul, then, as a Jew, was only partially developed; as a Christian, he reached "fulness of stature."

View Through City Gate of Damascus, Showing Street Where Ananias Lived

A Contrast Ending in Harmony

Standing in Jerusalem on a midsummer day in A.D. 37, one might have seen two travelers taking their departure, one to the south, the other to the north. The one going to the south rode in a chariot with royal trappings; the purpose in his heart was to find Jesus, and to that end he had a roll of the Scriptures, which he searched as he rode along. The traveler going toward the north also had a roll, a commission not to find Jesus, but to kill him in the person of his followers. The traveler to the north probably rode on horseback to the wondrously beautiful city of Damascus, one hundred and forty miles distant. The traveler toward the south had at least a thousand mile journey before him. One was a black man, the other a white man. A teacher sent of God, Philip the evangelist, appeared to the southern traveler, and a great light dawned upon his soul and he became a follower of the Lord Jesus. The Great Teacher himself appeared to the northern traveler and also a great light dawned upon his soul, and he became a follower of the Lord Jesus. And thus two travelers, going in opposite directions, with purposes and spirits totally diverse, came at last to the same goal, the recognition of Christ as their Saviour and Master. One is the treasurer of Candace, the first Christian of his race; the other is Saul the persecutor, afterward the great apostle to the Gentiles.

Paul's Account of the Journey

It is interesting to note what the apostle Paul afterward said about this journey. When he stood upon the steps of the Castle Antonia, in chains (Acts 22:1-11), having been apprehended by the Roman captain at the instigation of the Jewish leaders as one who was creating sedition, Paul, begging leave of the captain to speak the people, told them of the great ght from heaven which had fallen on him and the voice from heaven hich had reached his soul with its inning power. He told them also his being led by the hand, being inded in the eyes, that he might be ut in with God. And he told them w, in Damascus, he had been re-ived into the fellowship of the saints the laying on of the hands of An-ias, directed of God to do so. He ld them also how later he had re-ived a commission from God to each and teach in his name.

King Agrippa and Festus

Again Paul told the same story en he stood before King Agrippa d the "most noble Festus" (Acts :8-18), on which occasion Paul was ven a chance to plead his cause. ught of detail did he withhold from s kingly listeners—his murderous in-tion toward the Christians, the eat light which shone upon his way d the Voice which said, "Saul, Saul, y persecutest thou me? It is hard r thee to kick against the goad. ise and stand upon thy feet; for I ve appointed thee a minister and a tness." Agrippa and Festus were convinced of Paul's honesty of pur-se that they would have released n at once had he not appealed his se to a higher court, that of Cæsar, Rome.

Paul's reference to the prick of the goad showed how hard he was beset the Spirit of God. The ox-goad s a stout stick, about seven feet g, used for driving an ox from be-hd by a man plowing. On one end the goad was a sort of chisel, useful cleaning the plow; on the other end s a sharp point to jab into the ox to ge him on; there were also little gling rings close to the point, that minded the ox, through his ears, that must quicken his speed. Saul need-e to be brought low to the ground fore he could see any evil in his ys. It has been said that "Despair is that condition where the Spirit of G drives a man, where the best ane is possible." Saul certainly f nd himself in a dilemma that day, a he was approaching Damascus. d out of it came the best for him, a for all the world.

Saul thought to enter Damascus as a all-conquering hero, armed with t highest authority acknowledged a ong the Jews; but he was led in as a lind beggar. The portal of an inn, k t by one Judas, was the only door o n to him. And he was in no con-d on to partake of the little hos-pality to be found there, for it is re-cded that for three days he neither a nor drank anything. God knew ju where to find a man who could m ister to Saul, and so in a vision he sp ke to Ananias (of the same name, b very different in character from th man who, with his wife Sapphira, h been struck dead because of ly g). God told Ananias to go to th house of Judas, where he would fi Saul, and find him praying. Ana as was both astonished and al med, and even protested against go g because of the evil Saul had do e to the Lord's followers, and be-ca e of the commission he held from th high priest to continue his evil w k. Ananias must have felt very lik being invited to go into a lion's de But Ananias, being assured of G that Saul had been chosen by him to ear his name in places where he h before trampled upon it, went in faith to do as the Lord bade him.

The Baptism of Saul

A he did it with his whole soul, for w n he came into the house where Sa l was he laid his hands upon his he d and called him "Brother Saul." Th n and there Saul received the gift of he Holy Spirit. Then his sight ca e again, and he arose from his praying posture and was baptized by Ananias, and took food and was strengthened in body as well as in spirit. He was not in a hurry to get away from Damascus, but chose rather to stay there, consorting with the Christians, making close friends of those he had come to persecute, and preaching the once despised Jesus in the synagogues where he had expected to hold him in greatest dishonor, and to the Jews, whom he had expected to be his strong supporters in hunting down the Christians. No wonder that the conversion of Saul has been called the "master miracle" and "the greatest triumph which Christianity has accomplished." Jesus Christ himself undertook his conversion, and worked his supreme spiritual miracle.

Possibly all of the Christians in Damascus were so far able to overcome their fears of Saul by faith in God that, following the example of Ananias, they, too, called him "Brother Saul." But the Jews, disappointed in Saul, had only thoughts of how they might persecute him. And it was considered expedient by the Christians that he should leave Damascus secretly, so they let him down over the wall in a basket. Did Saul go in hiding? Not he! He went directly to Jerusalem, which had been the scene of his greatest activities as a persecutor. What wonder that "when he essayed to join himself to the disciples, they were afraid of him, not believing that he was a disciple." And they would not receive him until the noble Barnabas, whom they all loved and trusted, had vouched for him and told all about his wonderful conversion and his good work in preaching the Gospel of Jesus in Damascus. Then the Christians in Jerusalem received Saul, and "he was with them, going in and out."

Suffering Is Fellowship with Christ

Long before Jesus had called Paul to be an apostle he had said, "Blessed are they that have been persecuted for righteousness' sake; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye when men shall persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you falsely for my name's sake."

Before the conversion of Saul Judaism was to him the centre of all things, and the claims of Jesus as the Messiah, the Son of God, were entirely despised by him. But after his conversion Jesus became to Saul the great centre. What a change the light from heaven wrought in him! And as great a change was wrought upon the conscience of Saul. Nearly twenty years after his conversion he stood before the Sanhedrin a prisoner, and said, "Brethren, I have lived before God in all good conscience until this day." Had some one asked the question, "Is your Christian conscience, then, the same as your Jewish conscience?" undoubtedly there would have followed a swift answer to the contrary, and yet he would have repeated, "I have lived in all good conscience unto this day; for when I was a persecutor of Christians I was acting in accordance with the best light I had at that time." On another occasion Paul said, "I know nothing against myself," and he said it with the memory that he had dragged saints to prison and killed many followers of Jesus. But he added, "I am not hereby justified." We must glean from what he said that a man may do wrong without condemnation of conscience, but is not therefore blameless.

No word connected with morals or religion has been so much misunderstood and misapplied as the word conscience. It is quite generally thought that conscience is a God-given faculty, to be a judge of the right or wrong of our acts, while in reality conscience is only a judge of motives. It tells us whether or not we are doing what we think is right.

The Lord's Day*

THE mystic number, seven, runs through all history. Nearly every nation has the tradition that the world was made in six days, and that the seventh was a day of rest. Even the heavens were supposed to regard this number in the constellations of the Pleiades, sometimes called the Seven Sisters, and the Great Bear, and in the number of the sun's planets. The telescope has shown that many more stars than seven enter into the composition of these wonderful groups; but for hundreds of years they were considered to support the theory that for some inscrutable reason God had divided much of the universe into groups of seven.

Probably, after the death of Christ, and his resurrection upon the first day of the week, that day was always observed by the disciples as the Sabbath. The Jewish spirit dominated the part of the country where they lived. It was almost inevitable that they should make the day most hallowed to them into a sort of imitation of the Jewish Sabbath, and apply to it the great commandment regulating that day.

It is generally supposed that the word "Sabaoth" is but another form of the word "Sabbath." This is a mistake. "Sabaoth" is derived from a word meaning "armies," and really denotes "the heavenly host." The title, "The Lord God of Sabaoth," therefore, heightens the majesty of Jehovah by picturing him as the ruler of the stars in their courses, and of the innumerable company of the saints and angels.

The methods of keeping the holy day of the week have differed widely among both Jews and Christians in various ages and lands. The early Jews used the Sabbath as a day of feasting and rejoicing. Its legal observance was not rigorously required until after the Exile. It is interesting in the light of modern invention to note that, while the Jews could not light a fire for cooking on the Sabbath, they were permitted to keep their food hot in boxes of hay or dried chips; though we are wont to consider the "hay-box" as a new discovery.

The Pharisees in New Testament times excelled all that went before them in the minute enforcement of Sabbath-keeping. The plucking of ears of corn, the nursing of the sick (though an attempt might be allowed to heal a mortal ailment), the setting of a broken bone, and thirty-nine special forms of labor were forbidden on the Sabbath, though it was never a fast day.

The Egyptians divided their year into weeks of seven days each, calling the seventh the "day of Chronos"; and even among the Romans there are traces of a special regard for the seventh day. The heathen world very generally separated the year into weeks with some regard for the seventh day.

The modern Jews, like the Roman Catholics, consider the Sabbath as a festival, after an early religious service is over. It should be to every Christian a day of rest and rejoicing. Thus it will accomplish its high ethical and moral purpose of the renewing of the physical being; but this duty rests upon all mankind, without regard to religion.

To the Christian, a spiritual uplift upon the Sabbath is even more essential than physical renewing. Unless he feels nearer to God at the close of the Sabbath than he has felt during the preceding week, he has not rightly benefited by its sacred hours. To this end use all the means that he has provided. Make it in every sense his day. Let his Word and your own conscience decide the details for you, but use it to climb nearer to him.

Appeal of Our Necessities*

PERHAPS Mr. Dwight L. Moody combined, as much as any man that ever lived, the high spiritual fervor of the ideal Christian with the keen common sense of the practical administrator. He realized that the bodies and souls of men must be harmonious before the noblest development can be attained. The world has learned but slowly this great fact.

Some modern poet—was it Stevenson?—has voiced this thought in a letter to some loved one in words like these: "In my spasms of pain, I forget the whole world and can think only of self. At such times, I cannot think even of you."

In proportion, even moderate discomfort of body often raises such a clamor in our mental and spiritual ears that no still small voice of our better nature can be heard. The great plea for the care of the health is not alone that we may have sound and beautiful bodies, but that only in health can the mind and the soul do their best work. The great argument for clean and careful housekeeping is not that that is an end in itself, but that only in the fragrant and peaceful atmosphere of a well-conducted home can its inmates think and feel normally and nobly.

One of the great hindrances to our missionary work is the heat and humidity of the climate in many fields.

"Climatic conditions," says Dr. Devine in his interesting book upon the Philippines, "form a serious obstacle to religious activity in these islands. A good deal may be laid at the door of a temperature which struggles to record three figures, and seldom fails, for days at a time, to get within four or five degrees of its goal—and this not in the so-called 'hot season.'"

For a person not acclimated, exertion under such conditions may be fatal. But we know that the greatest of the ancient civilizations flourished in the low latitudes. The man who is used to it, who knows how to order his life so as to keep his vitality at its highest point, who knows how and when to work, and when to rest and recuperate, can probably accomplish nearly as much in a year in Persia or India, as in the salubrious States of Maine and Oregon.

"Any one who is to go to the foreign field," says Jacob Speicher, "ought to be able to stand a medical examination as severe as the United States Government requires of recruits for the Army and Navy. There can be a healthy mind only when the physical body is sound and well. Every missionary should know something about pathology and medicine. A wise missionary should always have good remedies on hand." There is nothing which more quickly predisposes people to think well of one than kindness to their sick, or attempts to make them more comfortable physically. The dullest can appreciate such service as this, and nothing more surely warms the heart and wins its confidence. In Dr. Rijnhart's book on Tibet, she often speaks of the kind reception given to her husband and herself in many towns on account of the aid rendered by them to the soldiers and other wounded during a certain great rebellion there. This is the lesson of Christ: "Feed my sheep, cure the sick, give the cup of cold water, regard the bodies of men if you would win their souls." "What is the New Testament," asks Dr. Jefferson, "but a description of Bethesda, the house of mercy, with Jesus at the centre of it, saying to the most helpless and hopeless of all the impotent folk that lie there, 'Rise and walk'?" He pitied not only their souls, but their bodies.

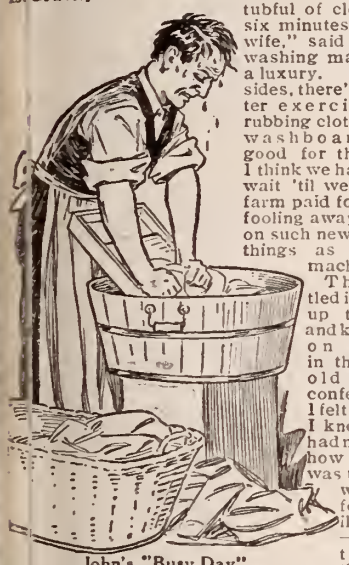
He Bought Her A 1900 Washer

One of Our Readers Tells How Her Husband Learned What Washday Means to a Woman

DEAR EDITOR:—Most men have no realization of what "wash-day" means to a woman. My husband is one of the best men that ever lived, but he laughed when I asked him one day to get me a 1900 Gravity Washer. I told him it would wash a tubful of clothes in six minutes. "Why wife," said he, "a washing machine is a luxury. And besides, there's no better exercise than rubbing clothes on a washboard. It's good for the back. I think we had better wait 'til we get the farm paid for before fooling away money on such new-fangled things as washing machines."



John's "Busy Day"

That settled it. I gave up the idea and kept right on washing in the same old way. I confess that I felt hurt, but I knew John had no notion how hard it was to do the washing for a family of five—three of them little tots. I am not very strong, and the washing, with all my other work, finally got the better of me. I had quite a sick spell and after things had gone at six and sevens for nearly two weeks, I suggested to John that he had better do the washing. We couldn't hire a girl for love or money and the situation was desperate.

One morning he started in. My, what a common there was in the kitchen! From my bedroom I occasionally caught glimpses of poor John struggling with that mountain of dirty clothes.

I never a man had all the "exercise" he wanted, my husband was that man! Couldn't help feeling sorry for him and yet it made me laugh, for I remembered how he made fun of me when I hinted so strongly for a 1900 Gravity Washer. When he finally got the clothes done and on the line, he was just about "all in."

That evening, John came to my room and said kind of sheepishly—"What's the name of the firm that makes those Washers you were telling me about?" I looked up their advertisement and found the following address:

The 1900 Washer Co., 223 Henry St., Binghamton, N. Y.
Canadian address: The Canadian 1900 Washer Co., 355 Yonge St., Toronto, Canada.

That's all he said, but he lost no time in sending for their Free Washer Book. The book came in due time and with it an offer to send the 1900 Gravity Washer on thirty days' free trial. My husband jumped at the chance to try the Washer without having to spend a cent. "We'll have four weeks' use of the Washer anyway, even if we don't decide to keep it," he said. So he told the Company to send on the Washer.

It was sent promptly, all charges paid, and the 1900 Washer Company offered to let us pay for it in little easy payments. The next week I felt well enough to use it. It is the nicest Washer I ever saw, and it almost runs itself. Takes only six minutes to wash a tubful, and the garments come out spotlessly clean.

We were all delighted with the Washer, and wrote to the Company that we would keep it and accept their easy payment terms of 50 cents a week. We paid for it without ever missing the money and wouldn't part with the Washer for five times its cost if we couldn't get another just like it.

If women knew what a wonderful help the 1900 Gravity Washer is, not one would be without it. It saves work and worry and doctors' bills. Takes away all the dread of wash-day. I feel like a different woman since I have quit the use of the washboard. And if any woman's husband objects to buying one of these labor-saving machines, take a hint from my experience. Let the man do just one big washing by hand-rubbing on the old-fashioned washboard, and he will be only too glad to get you a 1900 Gravity Washer.

Any body can get one on free trial, by first writing for the Washer Book.

Excuse me for writing such a long letter, but I hope Mr. Editor, you will print it for the benefit of the women readers of your valuable paper.

Sincerely yours, MRS. J. H. SMITH.

The Little Doctor

A Serial Story, written for "The Christian Herald"

By AGNES LOWE ELLIS

JACK GREEN'S story caused a good deal of laughter, and George said:

"I think that is the way with all the haunted houses. The noises are caused by some such simple thing, though often it is a long time until the cause is discovered. A great deal of talk was made about a certain old house in a town in England, and when the cause of the so-called unearthly noises was investigated, it proved to be a great old chimney full of bats."

Thinking that Mrs. Hunter and Mrs. Langdon would be expecting them home by this time, Lily and the young men bade the Greens a cordial farewell and were soon skimming over the snow. Aunt Phœbe had tea waiting for them, and Jack was invited to put up his horses and go to the kitchen for a while. Here he entertained the cook with the latest gossip in the neighborhood, and lazily enjoyed the grateful warmth of the comfortable room.

Dudley told the family, Aunt Phœbe included, that he was thinking of buying that old "haunted property," as it was still called, and allowing Jack and his family to live there. They could at least put the house in repair and make a living from the large garden.

The plan was considered by all to be a good one, and as Mrs. Green had so favorably impressed all of them, they at once enlisted the sympathies of Mrs. Hunter and Mrs. Langdon on her behalf. It was plain that she was likely to be in more comfortable circumstances ere long.

Jack's story of the haunted house was retold and the ladies laughed heartily.

"I think," said Mrs. Langdon, "that there is not a house in the whole neighborhood, whose history Jack does not know. I do hope Doctor Verner's kind scheme will lead the poor man to a life of industry and usefulness. He has entirely too much time for gossip. It is hard to get angry with him, though, for he is always good-humored. The only complaint he ever has to make is about the 'hard times.'"

Then the sleigh-bells were heard again, the fine horses drew up before the door, and the party were soon on their way home.

CHAPTER XXII

IN a long letter Marian told of travels in a land of torrid heat, scorpions, ancient ruins and a picturesque but indolent people. She wrote from Champoton, Mexico, and in closing said:

"In a few days we are to go many miles through the forest to the plantation in which my father is interested. I shall want to tell you about our trip to the plantation in my next, and must go now and make some preparation for the journey."

Just as Lily finished a telegram was handed to Dudley. It was from one of his brother physicians, and said, "Come at once. I have something to tell you." He wondered much what could be the cause of this urgent summons to return to the city, but with his usual energy began at once to make preparations for the journey. As there was a train due in less than an hour, the carriage was ordered and he was soon on his way to the station.

The next morning George and Donald, who were to return the next day, went over to say good-by to Aunt Phœbe, and thank her for the delightful day they had spent with her.

The old lady seemed unusually disturbed about something, and said so pitifully that she "did wish James would bring Marian home," that

There is But One "Holeproof Hosiery"

It has the name "Holeproof" on the toe. Please do not judge the genuine by heavy and coarse imitations.

"Holeproof" is the original guaranteed hosiery. We worked 31 years to perfect it. No maker with less experience can make a hose as good.

It is light, soft and attractive.

There are a hundred other hosieries with guarantees like ours. But you don't want hose cumbersome, heavy and coarse.

"Holeproof" today costs the same as the common. You may as well have it.

We pay an average of 63c a pound for our yarn. Ours comes from Egypt. We use 3-ply yarn throughout, with a 6-ply heel and toe. Thus we get superior wear.

We spend $30,000 a year for inspection. You'll insist on "Holeproof" if you'll compare all kinds. But don't say merely "Holeproof Hose." Look for the name on the toe, else you may get an imitation not even half so good.

If you want the most for your money you must see that you get "Holeproof."

This guarantee comes in each box of six pairs: "If any or all of these hose come to holes or need darning within six months from the day you buy them, we will replace them free."

The Little Doctor

George was at a loss to know what could be the matter.

Of course, he would not betray by word or look his desire for an explanation; but at last Mrs. Langdon told him that a letter had come from Edinburgh to Marian, addressed in a very peculiar hand and marked "Personal" and "in haste." She was at a loss to know what to do with it, as evidently it was not meant for her father's eyes, and should she mail it to Mexico, it might either fall into Squire Danforth's hands, or, what would be as bad, it might pass them on the way, and so not reach Marian at all. It must be of great importance, and yet, "Why should the letter be addressed to Marian and not to the Squire?" queried Aunt Phœbe, helplessly.

George wondered too; but he said nothing of his curiosity to Aunt Phœbe. Instead, he soothed her by saying that there was no reason why such a letter should not come. It might be in regard to some other person's affairs, which had been entrusted to Marian.

"Mr. Hunter," at last exclaimed Mrs. Langdon, "I feel as if I just simply cannot bear the oppressive stillness of this house any longer. I feel as if I must see Marian. There are some things connected with her childhood, of which I knew nothing until lately, as, during my husband's later years, and during the childhood and early girlhood of Marian, my home was far from hers; but I know enough to make me just a little uneasy always, and at times so anxious, that I simply cannot bear it. To-day is one of those times, and it seemed a special Providence when you made your appearance."

"In what way, Mrs. Langdon?"

"Why, I have a plan, and if you and your mother will help me to carry it out, you will bestow a real pleasure on me. I would like to go to New York and stay until the arrival of the travelers. That cannot be far distant now. Your mother and Miss Sanborn could accompany me; they could take Elsie with them, and the change would do your mother good. They are both so fond of Marian, that they would enjoy being in the city when the steamer arrived. Now, won't you be a good boy and try to persuade your mother to agree to my scheme? We could keep James and Marian there for a time and return to Branksome together."

"That is a capital idea," said George. "Thank you, dear Mrs. Langdon, for suggesting what I believe mother will readily agree to. Should she do so, Donald and I will stay over another day and go on with you."

Aunt Phœbe exerted herself to entertain little Donald, as she always did, showing him many curiosities brought by Squire Danforth from foreign countries.

"What a great traveler the Squire must have been!" remarked George.

"Yes, I never knew how great until a week before their departure. I mean, a week before our departure for Europe," she said, correcting herself. "He told me at that time much of his early life and of Marian's mother, whom I never saw. My husband and I, as I told you, had not seen James for years. After the death of my husband, I came to make my home here, to have an oversight of James' house, and care for poor motherless Marian."

In looking over the portraits in the Squire's study, George noticed one of a young and singularly beautiful woman. It seemed to hold his gaze and carry him back to the memory of—what was it? He paused for a minute, then said, "May I inquire if that lady was a relative of Squire Danforth?"

"That," she replied, "is a portrait of Marian's mother."

"What a sweet face!" said George; "and yet, although she is handsome,

IS THE YOUNG MAN SAFE?

ALL day long at the city gates
The royal watcher sits and waits,
While the battle rages fierce and wild
'Gainst his traitor son, his rebel child.
The lagging sun to the westward creeps,
But the king his lonely vigil keeps,
Caring naught for his haughty foes,
But tense with the pain that a father knows.

Look! O'er the plain, with failing breath,
A courier comes from the field of death.
"News from the strife, my lord the king!
Tidings glad from the field I bring;
For the fighting's o'er, and the foemen flee,
Thy throne is safe and thy kingdom free!"
Cried the king, "Enough!"—and his eye grew dim;
"Is the young man safe? Is it well with him?"

"Is the young man safe?" The heart-wrung cry
Has an age-long ring that brings it nigh.
'Tis the nameless dread at the father's heart
As he sees his son from the home depart;
'Tis the burden of many a mother's prayer
For the boy who wanders she knows not where;
'Tis the harrowing fear that will not sleep
Till it plows in the forehead its furrows deep.

"Is the young man safe?" Can he safely tread
In a path with cruel pitfalls spread?
Can he pass unscathed through the devil's snares
That are clustered thick in the city's squares?
Can he rest secure when he little knows
That his seeming friends are his subtlest foes?
Is the young man safe when in very truth
His path is strewn with the wrecks of Youth?

Safe? When the State protects the den
That gluts its till with the lives of men?
Safe? When a man, for a paltry toll,
May set a snare for his fellow's soul?
Safe? When a legalized machine
Will sell for a cent a view obscene?
When the licensed stage is a lecher's game
And a luring guide to the house of shame?
Is the young man safe when our laws condone
The "Thou Shalt Nots" on the slabs of stone?

"Is the young man safe?" Let Church and State
Heed David's cry at the city gate.
Let the Church forget its warring creeds
And wake to the call of living needs.
Let the city guard as its choicest wealth
The young man's vigor and moral health.
God make us wise—for the hour is near
When Youth is gone, and the Man is here.

Prevents Rust

If you used your tools as often as a carpenter does his—they'd never rust. Just before putting them away, rub a few drops of Household Lubricant over them. Then they'll keep their edge and won't rust.

HOUSEHOLD Lubricant

should be used for everything about the house that needs oiling—for sewing machines, bicycles, clothes wringers, etc. It will not corrode or turn rancid. Sold by dealers everywhere in the handy can that can be closed with its own spout.

THE IDEAL SIGHT RESTORER
for 15 days at our expense

It helps Nature in a pure natural way to strengthen the eyes and restore the natural vision. Its action is in the nature of a gentle massage, which stimulates the eyes by restoring the normal circulation of blood—that is all that weak eyes require. But it does more—it moulds the eye painlessly but surely to its perfect shape. This is necessary to correct near-sight, far-sight, astigmatism and kindred defects. It is absolutely safe—it does not come in direct contact with the eyes; and five minutes' manipulation in your own home, twice a day, is all that is necessary to correct eyestrain and headache, and relegate eyeglasses to the rubbish box. Throw away your eyeglasses. See nature, as you read with your naked eyes. Write for instructive booklet and 15 days test to THE IDEAL CO., 321 H 5th Ave., N.

SISTER'S TRICK

But it all Came out Right.

How a sister played a trick that brought psy health to a coffee fiend is an interesting ale:

"I was a coffee fiend—a trembling, nervous, hysical wreck, yet clinging to the poison hat stole away my strength. I mocked at 'ostum and would have none of it.

"One day my sister substituted a cup of iping hot Postum for my morning cup of offee but did not tell me what it was. I oticed the richness of it and remarked that he coffee tasted fine but my sister did not ell me I was drinking Postum for fear I ight not take any more.

"She kept the secret and kept giving me ostum instead of coffee until I grew stronger, ore tireless, got a better color in my sallow heeks and a clearness to my eyes, then she old me of the health-giving, nerve-strengthning life-saver she had given me in place of y morning coffee. From that time I beame a disciple of Postum and no words can o justice in telling the good this cereal rink did me. I will not try to tell it, for nly after having used it can one be conanced of its merits."

Ten days trial shows Postum's power to build what coffee has destroyed. "There's Reason."

The Little Doctor

Miss Marian is not at all like her mother, and she is not like the Squire, either."

"No—she is not like James at all," Mrs. Langdon replied, and then hurriedly called George's attention to some of the other family portraits.

Mrs. Hunter was always easily persuaded to go to New York. She loved to be near "her boys," she said, and thought the change would be beneficial; and then, like Aunt Phœbe, she hoped in this way the sooner to see the travelers, for whose return she longed exceedingly.

The family party were seated by the fireside, chatting of the proposed journey, when George said, "I think I will go over at once and let Mrs. Langdon know your decision, mother. Then her mind will be at rest."

At that moment, a loud peal from the door-bell was followed by the entrance of a servant bringing a telegram, which George hastily opened. It was from Dudley and read as follows:

"Important information conveyed to me through my Spanish patient, from Strahan, necessitates my going to Scotland. I sail to-morrow."

Quickly, ere he communicated the news to his mother, who was regarding him anxiously, George recalled the scene at the evening party, and the evident alarm of the man Strahan, when he discovered who Dudley was. A fear, which he tried in vain to banish from his mind, brought a worried expression to his face, and he was only recalled to the present by his mother's anxiously spoken question, "What is it, George?"

With a start he replied, "A telegram from Dudley, mother, with the news that he sails for Europe to-morrow."

Mrs. Langdon received this surprising news in a stunned way, and with a "Well, well!" as if she wondered what would happen next. Then, as she recalled the pleasant hours spent in the company of the bright young man, she lamented his departure, and all sorts of "perils by sea and land" began to loom up in the future.

At last George left her, with her promise to be at their house at an early hour next day, when they would leave together for New York.

Soon afterward came the unexpected news that the Squire and Miss Marian were about to start for home.

Practical Missionary Work for Only 25 Cents

EACH and every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has the opportunity to do a little far-reaching and practical missionary work by contributing the small sum of only a quarter to the cause. Twenty-five cents will purchase six copies of the Gospel of St. John, in Spanish and English—the little book that has done so much to spread the Gospel in the Philippines. On receipt of 25 cents we will send for you, to one of the missionaries in the Philippines, six of these little volumes, bound in durable leatherette with red edges, and containing in addition to the Spanish and English versions of the Gospel a number of Gospel hymns. We will also mail an additional copy, free of charge, to the person sending us the money. We learn from an officer in the United States Army that not only are these blessed books eagerly read by the natives, but by privates and officers in our own troops stationed in the Philippines, who are first attracted to them as an opportunity to master the Spanish language. Indeed, no one can measure the good that a single lot of six copies of THE GOSPEL OF ST. JOHN will work when wisely distributed in our far-away islands. SIX COPIES for 25 cents. Christian Herald Book Dept., 92 Bible House, New York.

A Spiritual Campaign in New Jersey

EVANGELIST J. B. PHILLIPS, of Macon, Ga., who has been conducting a series of meetings with several Baptist Churches in the vicinity of New York City since October, has just closed a most successful campaign. He began with the Old North Baptist Church, of New York, Rev. E. T. Sanford, pastor, where a most gracious revival was experienced. Out of a Baraca Class of eighteen young men only two remained unsurrendered. One whole class in the Sunday School came out on the Lord's side. A women's prayer circle has been inaugurated as the result of the influence of the afternoon meetings.

In the North Church, of Jersey City, the "old-time religion" proved its saving, cleansing and sanctifying power. A large number here renewed the vows of discipleship, while many accepted Christ as Lord and Saviour. Then was opened a campaign with four large churches in the Newark circle, which issued in a great spiritual refreshing. This campaign began in the Fairmount Church, carried its rising tide of spiritual fervor and devotion into the Mount Pleasant Church. From here it was waged upon the Harrison battlefield and reached its marvelous height of spiritual emotion and experience in the Old North Church.

During most of the campaign, Evangelist Phillips was assisted in the meetings, in solo singing and personal work, by Rev. W. H. Scott and wife, of New York.

At the close of the regular Sunday evening service in the North Church, seventy-five persons of the different churches accompanied the evangelist to the railroad depot and bade him a touching farewell. It is announced that Rev. J. R. Schaffer, of Kearney, N. J., will assist Evangelist Phillips in his next Northern campaign.

The Men and Women of To-Morrow

BOYS and girls, you who have life and the world before you, do not let the moments fly idly by. Life seems long, but there is much to accomplish. Youth is the golden age for work and for study as well as for play, and in after years each wasted hour may cause you unavailing regret.

Whatever you know, there is much more to learn; whatever your condition, you may better it. If you are poor and can afford little money and less time for study, you are no worse off than were thousands of the wisest and wealthiest men of the day who sprang from poor beginnings. Edison studied telegraphy while a newsboy, and electricity when a telegraph operator. Lincoln and Grant and Garfield were poor boys, and your condition is incomparably better than was theirs, because in the World-Wide Encyclopedia you have an unrivaled textbook, a collection of the wisdom of the ages ready at your hand, while they had to trust to scattered and meagre sources of information.

But they, and others like them, had industry and a determination to succeed. Bring such qualities with you to the study of the World-Wide Encyclopedia and you cannot fail to win your way triumphantly in the battle of life.

For full particulars of our Great Encyclopedia Offer, and further information concerning the WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA—the finest of ALL up-to-date Encyclopedias—see special insert in our issue of March 10. Price $15, on easy instalments, or 10 per cent. discount if paid by cash accompanying order.

I Can Reduce Your Flesh Build Up Your Figure Correct Chronic Ailments

Would you like to accomplish these results by natural means and in a scientific, dignified manner?

I have helped over 30,000 women in the past six years by a few simple directions followed in the privacy of their own rooms.

Too Fleshy? I can reduce you and at the same time strengthen stomach and heart, and relieve you of such chronic ailments as:

Constipation	Rheumatism	Dullness	Sleeplessness
Torpid Liver	Weakness	Irritability	Weak Nerves
Indigestion	Catarrh	Nervousness	Weak Heart

I strengthen whatever organs are weak; start your blood to circulating as when you were a child; teach you to breathe so the blood is fully purified.

One Pupil Writes:

"Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I have reduced those hips and I feel so well I want to shout. I never get out of breath now. When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all so easy. I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

Too Thin? You can be round, plump, rested and attractive. Nature intended you to be, why should you not?

A pupil who was thin writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I want it, and I carry myself like another woman. My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion any more, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested I feel so well all the time."

Write me today telling me your faults in health or figure, and I will cheerfully tell you whether I can help you.

Send 10 cents for instructive booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly.

FEED YOU MONEY

Feed Your Brain and it Will Feed You Money and Fame.

"Ever since boyhood I have been especially fond of meats, and I am convinced I ate too rapidly, and failed to masticate my food properly.

"The result was that I found myself, a few years ago, afflicted with ailments of the stomach and kidneys, which interfered seriously with my business.

"At last I took the advice of friends and began to eat Grape-Nuts instead of the heavy meats, etc., that had constituted my former diet.

"I found that I was at once benefited by the change, that I was soon relieved from the heart-burn and the indigestion that used to follow my meals, that the pains in my back had ceased entirely.

"My nerves which used to be unsteady, and my brain, which was slow and lethargic from a heavy diet of meats and greasy foods, had gradually but none the less surely, been restored to normal efficiency.

"Now every nerve is steady and my brain and thinking faculties are quicker and more acute than for years back.

"After my old style breakfasts I used to suffer during the forenoon from a feeling of weakness which hindered me seriously in my work, but since I have begun to use Grape-Nuts food I can work till dinner time with all ease and comfort." "There's a Reason."

The Conversion of Saul

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE young, ardent, zealous Saul of Tarsus "profited in the Jews' religion above many" of his contemporaries in his own nation, "being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions" of his fathers. His whole religious reputation hung on this zeal; he was a High Churchman of his day, and believed that his intolerance and spirit of persecution was really to the glory of God. The death of Stephen, the martyr's angelic face, his declaration when dying that he saw heaven open and Jesus standing on the right hand of God, his commendation of his spirit to that Lord whom he saw above, and then, beyond all else, his prayer for those who murdered him, Saul included—all this must have been difficult for an honest mind to get over. But, without doubt, Saul regarded every thought which went back to these things as inadmissible in a Jew, a Pharisee. He saw himself as the champion for God and for the truth; God saw him, as he afterward saw himself, "a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious," "breathing out threatenings and slaughter" against Christ's disciples.

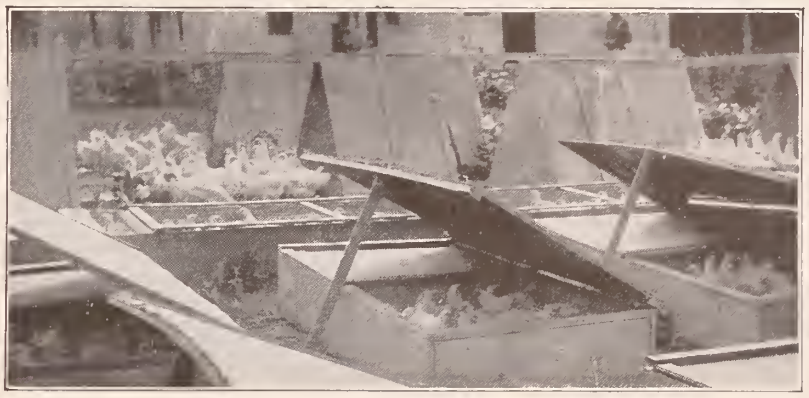
Saul was bent on the extirpation of the Christian heresy, as he deemed it; and, not satisfied with making havoc of the Church in Jerusalem, he persecuted them even unto strange cities. He was engaged now on a similar mission to Damascus, with letters from the high priest, empowering him to bind the disciples of Jesus. Very likely his heart swelled with pride as he thought of how full of self-sacrifice he was, how burning was his zeal, what a name he had, and would have, in Jerusalem, and what favor he must win with God. Yet that face and those words of Stephen could not but rise up before him; and, put them away as he would, regard them in the light of temptation as he would, they were realities; not one of the most zealous adherents of the law had either a presence, a power, or a spirit like that of Stephen. God saw the conflict; and suddenly, as Saul came near to Damascus on his journey, "there shined round about him a light from heaven." Saul knew nothing of spiriutal communion. He "fell to the earth, and heard a voice saying unto him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me?" What a revulsion of feeling! What an almost terrible fear of knowing the truth when he asked, "Who art Thou, Lord?" and received the answer, "I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest." What then? Had his life been one great terrible mistake? Was all his burning zeal for God really murder of God's people and blasphemy of the Son of God? Was Stephen, then, a true man, and was he himself the sinner? Must all his righteousness thus become "filthy rags" before his very eyes? Were all his good intentions and fancied good deeds the basest, most terrible sin?

A new horizon was opened before Saul; his old ideas of God lay in ruins at his feet; he could now see that for Jew and Gentile, for the self-righteous and for the open sinner, and, above all, for him, the convicted Saul, Jesus was God, and God was love. He could stand it no longer, and in the fullest, truest self-surrender he said, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?"

Saul spoke no empty words on the impulse of the moment; he never drew back, but lived henceforth a living sacrifice to Him whom he had previously persecuted. This is true conversion. When a convicted sinner is taken by surprise in finding out what God is, and when he yields himself over unreservedly to him, this is real conversion. Unless a man really meets with God, unless he has really, consciously to do with Him, unless He reveals Himself to him in such a way as to make it impossible to return to his old sinful life—unless, indeed, he receives the Holy Ghost—there is not real, genuine conversion.

A Living from Poultry on a City Lot

$1,500 in 10 Months from 60 Hens on a Corner of a City Lot



TO THE average poultryman that would seem impossible, and when we tell you that we have actually done a $1,500 Poultry business with 60 hens on a corner in the city garden 40 feet wide by 40 feet long, we are simply stating facts. It would not be possible to get such returns by any one of the systems of poultry keeping recommended and practiced by the American people, still it is an easy matter when the new PHILO SYSTEM is adopted.

Two Pound Broilers in Eight Weeks
are raised in a space of less than a square foot to the broiler, without any loss, and the broilers are of the very best quality, bringing here three cents per pound above the highest market price.

Our Six Months Old Pullets Are Laying at the Rate of 24 Eggs Each Per Month
in a space of two square feet for each bird. No green cut bone of any description is fed, and the food used is inexpensive as compared with food others are using.

Our new book, the Philo System of Progressive Poultry Keeping, gives full particulars regarding these wonderful discoveries with simple, easy to understand directions that are right to the point, and 15 pages of illustrations showing all branches of the work from start to finish.

Don't Let the Chicks Die in the Shell
One of our secrets of success is to save all the chickens that are fully developed at hatching time, whether they can crack the shell or not. It is a simple trick, and believed to be the secret of the Ancient Egyptians and Chinese which enabled them to sell the chicks at 10 cents a dozen.

Chicken Feed at 15 Cents a Bushel
Our book tells how to make the best green food with but little trouble, and have a good supply any day in the year, winter or summer. It is just as impossible to get a large egg yield without green food as it is to keep a cow without hay or fodder.

Our New Brooder Saves Two Cents on Each Chicken
No lamp required. No danger of chilling, overheating, or burning up the chickens as with brooders using lamps or any kind of fire. They also keep all lice off the chickens automatically, or kill any that may be on when placed in the brooder. Our book gives full plans and the right to make and use them. One can be easily made in an hour at a cost of 25 to 50 cents.

The Philo System Is Unlike All Other Ways of Keeping Poultry
and in many respects is just the reverse, accomplishing things in poultry work that have always been considered impossible, and getting unheard of results that are hard to believe without seeing; however, the facts remain the same, and we can prove to you every word of the above statement.

The New System Covers All Branches of the Work Necessary for Success
from selecting the breeders to marketing the product. It tells how to get eggs that will hatch, how to hatch nearly every egg, and how to raise nearly all the chicks hatched. It gives complete plans in detail how to make everything necessary to run the business, and at less than half the cost required to handle the poultry business in any other manner. There is nothing complicated about the work; any man or woman that can handle a saw and hammer can do the work.

A FEW TESTIMONIALS

Valley Falls, N. Y., Sept. 5, 1907.
It was my privilege to spend a week in Elmira during August, during which time I saw the practical working of the Philo System of Keeping Poultry, and was surprised at the results, accomplished in a small corner of a city yard. "Seeing is believing," they say, and if I had not seen it would have been hard to believe that such results could have followed so small an outlay of time, space, and money. (Rev.) W. W. Cox.
Oct. 22, 1908.
P. S.—A year's observation, and some experience of my own, confirm me in what I wrote Sept. 5, 1907. The System has been tried so long and by so many that there can be no doubt as to its worth and adaptability. It is especially valuable to parties having but a small place for chickens; seven feet square is plenty for a flock of seven. (Rev.) W. W. Cox.

Ransomville, N. Y., Dec. 5, 1908.
Dear Sir:—Last spring we purchased your book, entitled "Philo System," and used your heatless brooders last spring and summer. The same has been a great help to us in raising chix in the health and mortality. The chix being stronger and healthier than those raised in the brooders with supplied heat. We believe that this brooder is the best thing out yet for raising chix successfully. We put 25,000 chix through your heatless brooders this last season, and expect to use it more completely this coming season. We have had some of the most noted poultrymen from all over the U. S. here; also a large amount of visitors who come daily to our plant, and without any exception, they pronounce our stock the finest and healthiest they had seen anywhere this year. W. R. Curtiss & Co.

Skaneateles, N. Y., May 5, 1908.
One article of the Philo System entitled, "A Trick of the Trade," has been worth three times the amount the book cost. I saved on my last hatch fifty chicks, which are doing nicely. W. B. Rease.

BEDOUIN WOMEN AT THE WELL

Our Unparalleled History Offer

Illustration is Exact Height of Every Volume
The 15 Volumes, Boxed, Weigh 60 Pounds
Shelf Measurement of Set, 28 x 10 Inches

APPROXIMATELY TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND DOLLARS have been expended on the production of this incomparable work, the Illustrated History of All Nations, which, by special arrangement with the publishers, we now offer at exactly half the original price. Brilliant contributions from pre-eminent scholars, the exhaustive system of indexing, and the topical arrangement of the text, combine to make this set of books not only a Superb Library of Historical Literature, but a Complete Encyclopedia of Historical Facts.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Beginning at the dawn of history, with the earliest record of the clay tablet or fragment of papyrus, and tracing the civil, social, intellectual and moral development of races and nations down to the present history-making day, every thread of the narrative unfolds new aspects of absorbing interest. As if under a magic spell we find ourselves transplanted to the obscure past of the Far East, surrounded with the semi-barbaric pomp of pagan despotisms, swept along the checkered way of the ancient Israelites, or lost in "the glory that was Greece and the grandeur that was Rome."

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Passing on to medieval ages, we trace the rise of barbaric peoples as they spread over all Europe, laying the foundation of a new civilization; see the birth of the great nations of Europe, and follow their destinies in the struggles for supremacy on land and sea. In no similar work is the history of our own country so wonderfully and impartially told, including even important events of the past year.

15 Massive Volumes — 5,000 Large Pages

The Fifteen Massive Volumes abound in brilliant passages of Description, Biography, Characterization and Anecdote, while throughout the fascinating narrative historical facts are presented in a direct, simple and forceful style that makes history easy to remember. The Customs, Manners, Dress and Occupations of the various tribes and nations that have peopled the earth are interestingly described, and special attention is given to the growth of Christianity.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

The Illustrated History of All Nations is not only an Education, but a Library of Inspiration. The word pictures here painted for us of the world's greatest men and famous heroes are incentives to noble deeds, while to stand beside the mighty Nelson at Trafalgar as the English fleet sweeps the power of France from the sea, to visit the broken-hearted Napoleon exiled on St. Helena, to see our own splendid Washington at Valley Forge and know the great Lincoln as he really was, teach us lessons of character that cannot readily be effaced. To quote from the Rev. W. C. Bitting of New York, "Every parent should put the Illustrated History of All Nations within reach of his children."

Illustrated History of All Nations

THREE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-EIGHT FULL-PAGE ILLUSTRATIONS enhance the beauty of this costly edition of the Illustrated History of All Nations—exquisite half-tone engravings, that give life and fresh interest at every turn of the narrative, and make the set worth double our present price.

THESE RARE ILLUSTRATIONS are reproductions of famous paintings by master artists, most of the originals being in the great galleries abroad. It would be impossible to say too much of these superb pictures or to adequately describe their beauty. Every volume is further enriched by a splendid frontispiece in rich color, which feature alone adds immeasurably to the value of the books.

SIXTY-FOUR FINELY ENGRAVED COLORED MAPS, historical, political and geographical, are added to the many special features of this matchless edition. These maps—many of which were specially draughted for this work—are invaluable to the student. The Illustrated History of All Nations has the Imprint and Endorsement of The Christian Herald as a guaranty of its reliability.

INDEX.—No more complete system of indexing has ever been devised. Each volume contains its table of contents. Every chapter is then subdivided into sections, and the contents of each section is indicated by a subhead in large type. To further summarize the text, a memorandum of each paragraph is printed in bold type on the wide margin of every page. Finally, in the last volume is the General Index to the complete work.

BINDING.—The Fifteen Massive Volumes are handsomely bound in a beautiful silk-finish cloth stamped in genuine gold, with the lettering in gold on a deep red panel, making a particularly rich effect.

THE TYPE is unusually large and very clear, and the paper on which the text is printed is an especially heavy, rough-finish stock, having a particularly beautiful texture. The 338 Exquisite Illustrations, on fine coated paper, are full-page inserts. 5,000 Large Pages — Nearly 3,000,000 Words.

WATERMARK.—The paper used in every volume bears the watermark "Louis Klopsch" as a Guaranty of the genuineness of this particular and very Superior Edition.

Punta Arenas, the Pacific Port of Costa Rica

Port Limon, the Port on the Atlantic Side

A PEACE COURT FOR CENTRAL AMERICA

By CHARLES M. PEPPER

An interesting event that makes for the peace of Central America and good relations with the United States and other countries, and which is especially important in view of the recent trouble between Nicaragua and Honduras, has just taken place in Costa Rica. This event is the installation of the Court of Justice at Cartago, a health resort near San José, the capital. The Court of Justice was provided for by the recent Central American Conference, held in Washington. It is the outcome of Secretary Root's recommendation, and is meant to encourage the five Central American republics to settle their little disputes in a friendly way.

The United States considers the Conference of so much importance that it sent a special delegate to be present at the opening of the Court. This delegate is Mr. W. I. Buchanan, who was one of the representatives of the United States at The Hague Conference last summer and who has served in various diplomatic capacities, having been Minister to the Argentine Republic and to Panama and a member of the Mexican and Rio Janeiro Pan-American Conferences. The Mexican government is also represented, President Diaz having selected Ambassador Creel to bear the greetings of his government.

The country in which this new Court of Justice meets is one of the most attractive of all the Central American republics. Costa Rica has live and dead volcanoes among its attractions, and it also has tropical vegetation that equals in richness that of any part of the world. It has ports on the Atlantic and Pacific, which are themselves very beautiful. On the Atlantic side the great entrepot is Limon and on the Pacific side Punta Arenas. Limon is one of the world's greatest banana shipping ports, for this is Costa Rica's chief source of wealth. Thirty to forty thousand bunches are often taken out as a single cargo by the fruit vessels for New Orleans and Boston and for Europe. When I was there in April a German vessel had just left with 60,000 bunches. Much of the banana cultivation in this region is done by Jamaica negroes, and they constitute the bulk of the harbor laborers who load the cargoes. However, this work now is done to a great extent by machinery, working in the form of an endless pulley. The bananas are carried from the freight cars to the loading crates, a few feet away, by the laborers, working themselves like a moving chain and all the time singing. Unless he can sing, the Jamaica negro does poor work.

Costa Rica in size is as big as the State of Indiana, but its population is only about equal to that of the District of Columbia, since there are not more than 350,000 inhabitants. The Costa Ricans differ from the other Central American inhabitants in that they are almost entirely of Spanish blood, there being neither Indian nor African mixture. They are fairly hard-working for a tropical climate, peaceful and courteous to strangers. There is a larger proportion of small land-owners than in any other Latin-American country. It may be for this reason that disturbances are rare and the revolutions of which so much is heard in other countries are almost unknown. Because of its tranquillity Costa Rica is often called the model Spanish-American republic.

A Picturesque Street Scene in Guatemala

San José, the capital, is a beautiful little city of 25,000 inhabitants, set up among the mountains. It has been called a ruby in a sapphire diadem. It has some fine public buildings and plazas or parks. It also has a good many bookstores, and the sale of school-books is one of the best lines of business which these bookstores do. So it can be judged that San José has a pretty good school system. It also has half a dozen daily newspapers.

The railway ride from Port Limon up to San José is a rare exhibition of the beauty of tropical forests. The trees are tall, with smooth trunks and gracefully branching limbs, and in the rainy season the leaves have a glossiness that is marvelous, while the whole vegetation is of the freshest green that can be imagined. This railroad runs across country almost on a parallel of north latitude 10 degrees, and it is along this line that population has gathered. There is not much immigration and the other regions have therefore opened up very slowly, though they offer many inducements to settlers who are accustomed to tropical agriculture.

Some question exists about the presence of Guatemala at the opening of this Court of Justice, because this country, which is Mexico's nearest southern neighbor, has been at odds with Mexico and also with the other Central American republics. However, Guatemala took part in the Peace Conference in Washington, and it is not likely to refrain for a long period from taking part in the tribunals created by that Conference.

Guatemala is one of the largest of the Central American republics, and it has a great variety of resources. Coffee is its chief export crop. The volcanic soil is very good for coffee, and much of the surface of Guatemala is covered with volcanic ash. There are a number of active volcanoes whose eruptions at times are magnificent to witness. Damage is sometimes done by these eruptions, but there is compensation in the end, because the soil is enriched by the fresh volcanic ash. At the time of the eruption of Mont Pelée there were volcanic disturbances in Guatemala also, and Santa Marta, which is one of its famous peaks, threw lava and pumice stone far out to sea. The bulk of the ashes, however, was left on its slopes, and in the following year the coffee crop was much greater.

It is said of this Guatemalan soil that its richness is so great that fences are grown instead of being built. It is true that along the railway line, instead of digging postholes and driving posts, young shoots of trees are planted and they grow with wonderful rapidity, so that a fence is soon obtained. The best known of the Guatemala volcanoes are Agua and Fuego, or Fire and Water.

The American Pulpit

A SERMON BY

Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D.*

The Anxious Soul's Question

TEXT—Acts 16 : 30, 31

THE apostle Paul lived in a perpetual state of revival. He had only to come into Philippi, the principal city of Macedonia, and to sit by the river bank, and Lydia, the seller of purple, straightway believed and was baptized. He had only to walk along the streets to the place of prayer, and there was so much of power about him that "a certain damsel, possessed with the spirit of divination," followed him and cried, saying, "These men are the servants of the most high God," and "Paul being grieved, turned and said to the spirit, I command thee in the name of Jesus Christ to come out of her. And he came out the same hour. And when her masters saw that the hope of their gains was gone, they caught Paul and Silas and drew them into the market place," tore off their clothes, beat them with many stripes and cast them into an inner prison, fastening their feet in the stocks. But this did not in any way affect these servants of God. It was doubtless true in their case, as one of the modern poets has expressed it, that "stone walls do not a prison make, nor iron bars a cage," for at midnight, in the midst of all the darkness, "they sang praises unto God and the prisoners heard them." What a strange sound it must have been in the old jail, where ordinarily only curses had been heard! But suddenly there came a great earthquake; the foundations of the prison began to shake and the doors were thrown open and "every one's bands were loosed." In the midst of all this confusion, the jailer sprang into their presence, and was ready to kill himself, thinking the prisoners had escaped, when Paul exclaimed, "Do thyself no harm, for we are all here."

"Conviction" the First Step

There is just in this connection a clear distinction drawn between men of influence and men of power. Ordinarily we say, what the church needs to-day is men of influence, meaning by this men of position. And so it does; but from this illustration I think we may argue, the greater demand is for men of power. Paul and Silas had not influence enough to keep themselves out of jail, but they had a power sufficient to pray down the prison walls and throw wide open its doors. There is also in the whole incident given to us a true and striking picture of what it means for one to be saved.

If I were an artist, I should like to draw upon a blackboard a great letter "C," then fill out from that one letter four words. These four words would present to us a picture of this Philippian jailer not only, but also of the one who really and truly comes to Christ. The first word would be "Conviction." This we surely find in the jailer, for we are told "he came trembling." It is not possible for any one to be saved without first of all experiencing real conviction; however, it ought to be suggested that in different individuals it may manifest itself in different ways.

First. Sometimes it is evidenced in great need. One would display his ignorance if he were to assert that Nicodemus, for example, was the chief of sinners; for he was a ruler of his people, an honored member of the Sanhedrin, a most circumspect man in every way; but in his heart there was a great sense of his need, which his position had never satisfied; and this compelled him, I imagine, to seek out the Great Teacher.

Second. Not infrequently it may assume the form of complete unworthiness, such as the poor publican had when he said, "God be merciful to me a sinner;" but the article there in the Greek was a definite one, and what he really said was this: "God be merciful to me the sinner," as if he were the only one in the world. This is a most hopeful condition.

Third. As a rule, it is the consciousness that we have sinned and are, therefore, under condemnation that disturbs us; and in the unregenerate state, it is the fearfulness that the penalty of the broken law may fall upon us; yet I am quite clear in my own mind that there may be a deeper conviction of one's sins after one's regeneration than before.

Stanley tells us that he found men in Africa who never knew that they were black until they looked upon a white man. So many a man can never know what sin is until he sees it in the presence of Jesus Christ. But whatever the form of conviction, it must surely be experienced before the light will dawn. Come to him just as you are, for he can satisfy your longings by filling you with himself and he is able to blot out all your transgressions and forgive all your sins.

"Contrition" the Next Essential

The second word starting with the letter "C" would be "Contrition." This the Philippian jailer had, for he "fell down before them." It is certainly true that one cannot come to God unless, first of all, he be possessed of the broken and contrite heart. Why should this not be true? We have sinned against God and there must be contrition for it if we are to be forgiven. God may be ever so willing to forgive, still he does not do it without contrition.

In the State prison of Iowa there is a young man held as a convict, against whom the charge of arson stands, and also the attempt to kill. Very recently, the party whose building was fired circulated a petition asking that the young man be pardoned; the man whose life was attempted followed his example, and succeeded in securing the names of the judge by whom he was sentenced, the attorney who prosecuted him and the entire jury which found him guilty. This petition was carried to the Governor. In the face of it, strong as it was, he said, "No, the man cannot be pardoned; for," said he, "his crime was not committed against the individual, but against the commonwealth of Iowa, and he must serve his sentence." And it ought to be remembered by the sinner that these words are true, "against thee and thee only have I sinned." So there must be contrition or there cannot be salvation; and yet what a marvelous thing it is that, if one be ever so great a sinner, the moment this spirit is manifest God blots out all his transgressions.

It is stated that, in St. Petersburg, a father's heart was well-nigh broken because of the prodigality of his son, who was addicted to the habit of gambling, and with that came the accompanying vices. At last the old father conceived the idea that what the boy needed was better surroundings, and so he set out to secure them. What a mistake this is and how many have made it! That is not what you need. This father of whom I speak secured his son's appointment in the army, but he went from bad to worse until he had reached the end of it all. Completely discouraged, he was casting up his accounts and, when the overwhelming sum was known, in great desperation he wrote at the bottom of the column these words, "Who is to pay all this?"

Then Follows "Conversion"

The Emperor of Russia, going through the barracks to inspect the soldiers, passed this young man, who, with his head in his arms, had fallen asleep. The emperor, glancing at the figures before him on the table, read the question, and then bending over wrote one word, "Nicholas." And the story goes that that one man was free. I do not know whether this story is true, but I do know that if you enumerate all of your sins from the earliest recollection to the present moment, and beneath the sum of them all write this question, "Who is to pay all this?" there will be one name written in answer to it,

> Sweetest name on mortal tongue,
> Sweetest note in seraph song,
> Sweetest carol ever sung,
> Jesus, blessed Jesus.

The third word starting from the letter "C" would be "Conversion," and this we find in the Philippian jailer, for we are told "he washed their stripes." This was surely a great change in the man. At first he exultingly fastened their feet in the stocks, and now I can imagine him tearfully stooping down with cooling touch to ease their pain. There must be conversion if we are ever to be saved.

I am speaking of the new birth, that is, God's part of it; but I am emphasizing the thing man must do if he is ever to see the light. In one way it is "Right about face!" or it is following the example of the blind men who "put themselves in the way of Jesus"; or it is the obedience of the lepers who, as they went, were cleansed. Indeed, to sum it all up, it is for the unsaved man to have "the willing mind." (Isa. 1:19.)

God never saved any man until, first of all, he was willing to be saved; so whether one kneels at the altar, or bows in prayer in his own home, or stands in the crowded audience, or signs the inquirer's card, the end of all these things must be the submission of the will to God; and then he does his own work, and we are born again, or from above.

Confessing Christ Before Men

The fourth and last word to be completed from the letter "C" is "Confession," and this is clearly found in the experience of the jailer; for we are told "he was baptized." What a mistake it is for a man to believe in his heart and fail to confess with his lips! Such a position is never satisfactory, and never brings real joy. It is not being obedient, to say the least. If your physician should write a prescription for you in your sickness, and you should have it filled in a peculiar way, putting in two parts and leaving out two parts, he would have the right to find fault with you and tell you that you would never get well until you took the whole prescription. It is true with the Great Physician in our sin sickness; he has written the prescription that assures us of life—it is composed of two parts (Rom. 10:9, 10):

First. Believe in your heart that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and acknowledge him as Lord.

Second. Confess with your lips that you have appropriated him, not as a Saviour, but as your Saviour, for if one desires to be fully saved he must commit himself. It is not walking with the army that constitutes one a soldier; it is not the wearing of the garment of a soldier that makes him such, for this may be hired or stolen; but it is the definite enlistment, and this comes to one who would be a soldier of Jesus Christ when he definitely and clearly confesses him. This is his enlistment.

The Query of the Unsaved

"What, ~~therefore,~~ must I do to be saved?" This seems to be the unsaved man's first query. Philosophy has never answered this question yet. Infidelity has tried it, and made it a mockery. God's answer is clear and simple. The Bible says, "By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God." "Not of works, lest any man should boast." It is very easy to receive a gift; the first step in salvation is not to give something, but rather to receive; then receiving eternal life, you may give yourself unto him for service.

Man would naturally say, if you would be a son of God, try to walk as a son and you will eventually become such. But God makes it very clear that there can be no real life until there is a step taken, first of all, by faith; then he reveals himself. The things of God are spiritually discerned, and God is a revelation, not an explanation. To make it very clear, the best answer is the one given to the Philippian jailer: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." There is something very significant in the way the names of Jesus Christ are used. For example, when he is called Lord, it is to emphasize his kingly office, or his reigning power; and what can the meaning be but this, when we are told to believe on him as Lord? We must reach the place where we are willing to let him rule and reign in our life. Can you submit to this? He will never make a failure of it. Give him absolute control; never take a step without his guidance—this is the secret of grace and joy.

Jesus is the earthly name, and we are told that "thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins." It must be necessary, then, for one to get a conception of him as he hangs upon the cross; and certainly we know he was there for just one purpose, namely, "That he might die in our stead."

Major Whittle tells the story of a company of bushwhackers, arrested in Missouri during the days of the Civil War. They were sentenced to be shot, when a young boy touched the commanding officer on the arm and said, "Won't you allow me to take the place of the man standing yonder? He has a family, and he will be greatly missed; no one will miss me. May I take his place?" When the officer had given his consent, the young boy stepped forward, drew the man out of line and stepped in his

Opening the New Queensboro Bridge

View of the Cantilever Bridge from the Manhattan Side

Several Thousand People Crossing the Bridge the First Hour After Opening

ON March 29 another great bridge connecting New York City was opened by Mayor McClellan, and thousands of people who make their homes in the Borough of Queens and who have been waiting nine years for the completion of the bridge cheered themselves hoarse when the wooden barriers across the driveway were broken down at the command of the engineers.

The new bridge, called the Queensboro, is the third which has been thrown across the swift current of the East River, as the lower stretch of Long Island Sound is called. Further down stream a fourth, to be called the Manhattan Bridge, is four-fifths done. This latter bridge, however, will only be an added link between lower New York and Brooklyn, and is but a few hundred yards from the old Brooklyn Bridge. The new Queensboro Bridge opens up an entirely new district. It reaches from Fifty-ninth Street, in the Borough of Manhattan, across Blackwell's Island, on which some of its massive piers rest, and continues to the Borough of Queens, for which it will form the main outlet. All the current of travel from a large section of Long Island, which formerly had to go by way of Williamsburg, in Brooklyn, will take this, the shortest route, and save from one to two hours.

The Mayor came up the approach to the New York side in an automobile, and was met by a procession of twenty-two automobiles from Long Island, filled with enthusiastic citizens of Queens. The houses nearby were decorated with flags, and the great steel structure itself, painted as it was a bright red, had a most festive appearance. Ten thousand people were banked around the entrance, waiting for a chance to cross on the first day. The first bridge ticket was presented to the Mayor, the workmen hastily tore away the wooden barriers which had blocked the road for months, and automobiles, honking joyously, sped onto the right-hand driveway of the bridge. A deafening roar broke from ten thousand throats, and those who happened to glance upward suddenly saw little knots, tied high on the steel towers, break out into large American flags. At this signal every factory on either shore, for a mile up and down the river, opened its whistle and kept it open while the official tour was being made. At times, through the tremendous din, could be heard the sharp toots from the whistles of the tugs and all the rest of the river craft far below, who were assisting as much in the general celebration as their lowly position would permit.

At the Long Island end the Mayor was greeted by what seemed to be every man, woman and child in Queens. The plaza and side streets, as far as the eye could reach, were black with people. Every one carried a small American flag, and every house had one flying from a window. The official procession turned and came back on the upper roadway. As soon as it left the New York approach the police guard opened right and left, and the great crowds surged onto the bridge. In front were two hundred sprinters, ready to race for the honor of being the first one to cross the bridge. Some had trained for weeks to be ready for the event. Over 15,000 people crossed in the first hour, and the procession of humanity was still going late at night, the entire structure having been illuminated. At five and six o'clock, when the ferries were usually crowded, there was a noticeable diminution in the numbers who bought tickets and it showed that the new structure was "filling a long-felt want," as well as gratifying the curiosity of people on the opening day.

The Queensboro Bridge is one of the most costly in the world. When the painters finally leave, it will have cost, with its stone approaches, the sum of twenty million dollars. It is built on the cantilever plan, and its total weight is 83,400,000 pounds. It is 7,636 feet long. Its Manhattan approach is 1,052 feet long, and the Long Island approach 2,672. Only the foot and driveways are ready for traffic. It has four trolley tracks, two tracks for elevated trains. The two foot-walks are each sixteen feet wide, and the carriageway is fifty-two feet wide. Under the bridge approaches, at either end, will be stores and markets.

At one time it was planned to have six tracks on the bridge. Then came the terrible disaster on the St. Lawrence, where the uncompleted cantilever bridge at Quebec fell into the river, and it was decided to reconsider. It was finally thought better to go back to the original plan and not over-burden the structure. It is a complete departure from the type of bridge hitherto built across the East River, the other three being of the suspension type.

The celebration was largely unofficial and carried on by the people themselves, the city reserving its formal ceremonies till June. It is then expected that President Taft will be present, and the city has appropriated $40,000 for processions, fireworks, athletic contests and other events.

lace. When the command was given to fire, the oy fell dead; his grave is still to be found in the ttle Missouri town, and on the little stone that arks it are cut these words, "Sacred to the memory f Willie Lear; he took my place." The commandng officer's name was John McNeill, and the story as vouched for recently by one of the officer's peronal friends in Evansville, Ind.

This is true of Jesus Christ; he died that we might ve, but we must accept him. There is no life exept in him, and the idea of substitution is found in l the Bible. He is also called Christ, but this is is resurrection name, and as Christ he stands this oment at the right hand of God, making intercesion for us. Can you accept him there?

It does seem to me that this makes the whole hristian life very plain. He is my Lord, because e rules me; he is Jesus because he died to save me; nd he is Christ because, whenever the mistakes of fe overtake me, he stands at God's right hand to ake explanation and intercession. Do you thus eceive him?

It is also to be remembered that, in the case of the hilippian jailer, light came in all its clearness hen "they spake unto him the word of the Lord." have very little confidence in that man who is not ounded upon God's Word for assurance of his salation. I have all the hope imaginable for that one ho will receive it with meekness. I do not mean at he should be able at once to explain it; I only sk that by faith he receive it (John 5:24). His ord is sometimes spoken of under the figure of the hammer, and as such it can break our stubborn wills. It is sometimes said to be the light, and as such it will penetrate the darkness. It is frequently called the water, and water always cleanses by displacement. I am persuaded that, if we could only persuade men to receive the Word of God, it would mean a joy unspeakable and a peace which the world cannot give, neither take away. One could not live in the promise and declaration of John's third chapter and sixteenth verse without rejoicing in hope. Say it over and over to yourself this way, and thus make it your own verse: "God so loved 'me' that he gave his only begotten Son that 'I' might believe in him and should not perish, but have everlasting life."

I would not have you forget, in this interesting story of the jailer, that he was baptized. Baptism is inseparably connected with believing and is as certainly a command of God's as that we believe. We may differ as to the mode, but too much emphasis cannot be placed upon the command itself; it is, of course, true that one may be without it, as, for example, the thief on the cross; as for him, it was impossible; but I should be afraid to run the risk when Jesus said, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned." At least, when we stand before him, we could not but say that we had neglected to do as he commanded. It is the experience of Christians everywhere that this one of the sacraments brings upon the believer a marvelous blessing, and leads him out into an experience which can never be described in words.

It is not to be forgotten that when all these steps had been taken by the Philippian jailer he rejoiced, believing in God, with all his house. That word is certainly true that "in his presence is fulness of joy, and at his right hand there are pleasures for evermore." And why should it not be so?

One of my friends, a Scotchman, told me that some time ago he was going through his native land and stopped at a little cottage by the wayside to rest; when he entered the room his first inclination was to be seated in a very comfortable chair, which occupied a prominent place in the room; but just as he made the attempt an old Scotchwoman sprang to the chair and, lifting her hand, exclaimed, "Nay, nay, man; don't sit there," and then she pointed to the scarlet cord fastened around the chair, which he had not noticed before, and explained, "One day Her Majesty the Queen, a sudden storm coming upon her, left her carriage and came into this house." And, with a look of great reverence, this venerable woman added: "She sat in this chair, and when she went away we fastened this scarlet cord about it, and I said, 'We will give it to John, and he can keep it in his family,' for was it not wonderful that Her Majesty the Queen had used it?" But I have a greater cause for rejoicing; Jesus Christ the King of kings has counted it a joy to take up his abode in my heart. He has cast around me the scarlet cord which marks me as his own. It is a great thing for me to say that he is mine, but it is greater far for me to declare that I am his, and with the Philippian jailer therefore I rejoice with exceeding great joy.

FIRST METHODIST CHAPEL IN RUSSIA

By GEORGE A. SIMON, D.D.

Superintendent of Missions in Finland and Russia

"YOU will never dedicate or use your chapel, and if you attempt it you will all be thrown into prison and the chapel torn down!"

So spoke our enemies at Wirballen. The chapel was to have been dedicated last October; but, in order to forestall any serious trouble, Pastor Durdis and the writer appealed to the Governor of the province. Weeks elapsed, but the promised answer did not come.

The writer took the matter to the highest ministry in the empire, becoming acquainted with a number of influential persons, all of whom accorded him cordial and courteous treatment, lending interest and support to the project. A telegram was sent to the Governor of the province. Soon afterward a messenger from the Department for Foreign Religions came to the writer at eleven o'clock one night, with permission to dedicate and use the chapel. "The earth does move," said Galileo. And Russia moves, too!

It is but a very humble, red brick chapel, of Wesleyan simplicity, that stands on the German border. It does not even bear the official name "chapel" or "church," but is simply known as "the Methodist House of Prayer." Yet small and unpretentious as this house of worship is, it blushes modestly as a Bethel of historic significance, for it is the very first Methodist Church ever planted on Russian soil!

Wirballen is a town of 4,000 people, having a cosmopolitan and official character. It is a customs centre, being the first Russian point on the trip from Berlin to Petersburg. From a missionary standpoint, like most customs centres on the border, Wirballen does not present the easiest material to work upon. But no spot is too hard for Methodism! That our first chapel in Russia should have been erected in just such a border town seems to be both providential and prophetic, as though one would say to us, "Begin with the hardest place, and from the western border draw the Methodist chain via Kowno, Landwarowo, Wilna and Petersburg, where there are already Methodist societies, eastward through Siberia until you reach the Chinese boundary, thus completing the world-circle of our beloved world-parish."

Crowded in that small chapel on the first Sunday in February there were fully 225 people, who seemed fairly spellbound by the speaking and singing of the warm-hearted Methodists. Away up front sat the chief of police, a fine appearing gentleman, who attended the three services and was deeply interested. Bishop William Burt, of Zurich, Switzerland, preached the dedicatory sermon. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" our campaign motto, was put up on the wall behind the pulpit. The work at Wirballen began in the humble home of a railroad employee a couple of years ago. The meetings grew. Inspired by a common impulse, the leader decided to put up a little chapel. The good brother in whose home the meetings had started offered a piece of ground and 100 rubles ($51.50), while a builder and mason, who had just been converted, promised his labor free. To-day that chapel stands as a monument of the love and gratitude of young converts. The entire property has a valuation of 2,000 rubles ($1,030), and still has a debt of about 800 rubles.

A few days before the dedication I received a touching letter from one of our Russian students in America. He told how he had been born at Wirballen in February, 1882, and left by his parents with poor women in the place. As the promised money for his support failed to come, he was soon considered a burden, passed around from one home to another, changing his religion each time and finally adhering to the Greek Orthodox Church. At the age of thirteen he became his own boss, worked as an office boy, later as a clerk in a police court, attended high school, then became secretary to a high government official. Then he began a search for his parents, whom he traced to Brooklyn, N. Y. After a short correspondence they invited him "home," and what a joy it was when he kissed his father, mother and brother for the first time in his life!

But this joy did not last long. Through a young Russian, whose acquaintance he had made in Brooklyn, he was led to Christ; but as his parents were infidels they at once cast him off. Feeling called to the ministry and finding a good field of labor in the Salvation Army, he spent three years in their ranks, leading many a prodigal to the Saviour. But soon he saw the need of a thorough education for a more successful career in the Lord's service. Through the kind aid of friends he has been enabled to enter the Methodist College and Seminary at Berea, O., where he is preparing himself for the pioneer mission of Methodism in Russia. The brother who led him to Christ is also at the same school, and will likewise come to this field. He was born in Petersburg. How wonderful are the ways of the Lord! From that spot where stands our first Methodist chapel there comes one of our first Russian preachers! Pray daily for the evangelization of dear Rossija!

HONORING THE MEMORY OF JOAN OF ARC

EVERY one who has read the romantic life of Joan of Arc, "The Maid of Orleans," will hear with interest the announcement that on the 18th of this month she will be formally declared blessed by the Roman Church, and her name enrolled on the list of its saints. For generations, however, her name has been held in honor by all those who respect courage and honor a life actuated by the purest motives and the most exalted patriotism, whatever their own country or creed may be. Her statue stands in Paris, Rouen, Compiegne, and other cities of her own loved France, and the pictures of her life are painted upon the walls of the Pantheon.

The question whether she was inspired has been a moot point with some historians, but the most skeptical have had difficulty in accounting for her achievements in any ordinary way. A simple country girl who, in ten weeks, could convince king, nobles and generals that she was called of God to deliver France, who commanded war-hardened veterans, and led them in attempts which seemed to invite disaster, but which brought victory and defeated some of the most skilled leaders of the day, is a character in history without a parallel.

Joan first saw the light of day in the little, out-of-the-way village of Domremy on the Meuse. Here, until her thirteenth year, she lived a quiet, simple life. The family was composed of the father, Jacques d'Arc, his wife, three sturdy sons, who helped upon the farm, and one daughter besides Joan. Her home had more of the comforts of life than many of those in Domremy, and the house, which still stands, is large and roomy and shows that its occupants must have been people of some substance. Joan did not tend the sheep, as has been stated by some romancers,

Joan's Entry into Orleans

but she herself said later that her duties were in the house, helping her mother. "Her mother had taught her to spin and sew," she said "and so well that she did not think any woman in Rouen could teach her anything."

Joan lived at a time when France was at the mercy of an invader and torn with civil strife. The English king claimed the crown of France and only a small part of the country still held out for its own sovereign.

Domremy was loyal to the French king, but the next village was for the combined French and English alliance, and the children often fought the matter out in the fields.

Then came the period of her visions. It seemed to her as if a voice spoke to her, "Jeanne, you must go to the help of the king of France; and it is you who shall give him back his kingdom." When she was seventeen she felt she must act.

She was taken to the king, in February, 1429. She was examined searchingly, but she could not be shaken. They asked for signs. She said she "had not come to give signs; take me to Orleans (then besieged), and I will show you signs." She was given an army, and the enemy were beaten from before the walls. Then she brought victory at Jargeau and Patay. The road lay open, and the king was crowned at Rheims, Joan standing by with her banner. Then the tide turned. She was captured at Compiegne by the Burgundians and sold to the English. After a while she was tried at Rouen as a witch. The "trial was a mockery of justice," and the Bishop of Beauvais, an opponent of the French king, had her condemned as a sorceress, and May 30, 1431, she was burned. She died herocially, as she had lived. Every year, in Orleans, they honor her memory, and the festival this year will be celebrated as never before.

A 30,000-MILE EVANGELISTIC TOUR

Edwin H. Bookmyer

Mrs. C. M. Alexander

Charles M. Alexander

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman

Mrs. R. C. Norton

Dr. F. C. Ottman

ON the 26th of March, on the steamer Makura, there left Vancouver, Canada, a company of about twenty evangelists, Gospel singers and others, under the direction of Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and Mr. Charles M. Alexander. The departure marked the beginning of a nine months' evangelistic and missionary tour which will constitute one of the most unique revival journeys of modern times. The company expect to visit about ten countries and to cover nearly thirty thousand miles before the tour concludes at the end of this year.

The party includes Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, his daughter Agnes Pruyn Chapman, and his son Hamilton Chapman; Mr. Charles M. Alexander and his wife, formerly Miss Helen Cadbury, of Birmingham, England; Dr. Ford C. Ottman, of Stamford, Conn.; Robert Harkness, pianist; Mr. and Mrs. William Asher, saloon evangelists; Mr. Ralph C. Norton, in charge of personal work, and Mrs. Norton, pianist and Gospel singer; Ernest W. Naftzger, soloist; Frank Dickson, Gospel singer; J. Raymond Hemminger, Gospel singer; Mrs. E. A. R. Davis and George T. B. Davis.

The object of the tour is to conduct revival missions in the leading cities of Australasia and to hold conferences and meetings with missionaries in China, Japan, Korea and other countries. Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander hope there will be a continuous revival movement throughout the entire journey, and that many souls may be won to Christ, on railway trains and on steamships, on land and on sea. An interesting feature of the tour is that the party will distribute five thousand New Testaments and ten thousand Gospels as they journey along. They hope to obtain many thousands of new members for the Pocket Testament League and to inaugurate the movement in a number of foreign lands.

The first point to be visited on the tour will be Hawaii, where one or two meetings will be held in the city of Honolulu, as the ship passes there en route to Australia. Another meeting will probably be held at the Fiji Islands and still another at Brisbane, Australia. The party expect to reach Sydney about the middle of April. The first great mission in Australia will be held in Melbourne, where large preparations for it have been made months in advance. For a part or all of the time, meetings will be held in the great Exhibition Hall, which will accommodate about 12,000 people. After Melbourne, meetings will be held in other leading cities, including Sydney, Ballarat, Bendigo and Geelong. It is probable that the party will also pay brief visits to Tasmania and New Zealand.

About the middle of October the band expect to leave Australia for China, visiting the Philippines en route. In the Flowery Kingdom, meetings will be held in Canton, Hong Kong, Shanghai, Nanking, Hankow, Peking and Tien-Tsin. Conferences will also be held in Seoul, Korea, and in two or more cities in Japan.

Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander believe that the success of their journey will depend largely on the earnest prayer which is offered in their behalf by the Christians of America, England, Australia and other lands. It is their earnest desire to be upheld throughout the entire journey by the prayers of godly people throughout Christendom. They hope to enrol twenty-five to fifty thousand people in a great world-wide Prayer Circle. This is simply a band of people who wish to have a share in the work by praying earnestly for them. A Prayer Circle card has been issued, which reads as follows:

CHAPMAN-ALEXANDER
PRAYER CIRCLE

"BRETHREN, PRAY FOR US."
1. Thes. 5:25.

THIS IS A CIRCLE of those who will pray for Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander, and their party, as they go to Foreign Lands to conduct Missions and hold Conferences.

I HEREBY ENROL MYSELF as a member of this Circle of Prayer.

Name .....

Date .....

This card has been neatly printed, and is intended to be hung on the wall of one's room as a daily reminder. As many copies of it as may be desired can be secured, free of charge, by addressing the Chapman - Alexander Prayer Circle, Winona Lake, Ind.

Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander, and their coworkers, will appreciate the prayers of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, during their absence on this world tour, more than words can express.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—REV. WILLIAM WILBERFORCE RAND, D.D., Secretary Emeritus of the American Tract Society, passed away on March 3. He was in the ninety-third year of his life, and had been in the service of the society for nearly sixty-one years. He was an editor of rare skill, an author, whose Bible dictionary is a monument of knowledge, and a hymnologist.

—MISS YONER, a missionary of the Christian Alliance in India, is dead. For many years she was in charge of the girls' orphanage at Khamgaon, Berar. More than once she had to take her girls out into temporary huts in the fields on account of plague. She lived with them in the heat and guarded them faithfully. In the hot season she refused to go away for rest. In September she broke down with fever. She was persuaded to go to the hills, but it was too late, and she passed away quietly in the train. Many CHRISTIAN HERALD readers took an interest in her work, and especially in her "buffalo farm" and other industrial efforts.

—A CONTINUOUS EVANGELISTIC CAMPAIGN is announced by the National Bible Institute, of New York, for the spring and the coming summer. Over nineteen hundred evangelistic meetings are to be held. A series of daily meetings will also be held on week nights, and a special series of week night and Sunday afternoon and evening evangelistic meetings on the Bowery. A Gospel wagon will be used and at least four hundred evangelistic meetings will be held on the Bowery during the season, to reach those who do not attend regular services.

—"FORTY MILLION AMERICANS now live in territory in which the saloon is under the ban," says the Louisville (Ky.) Observer. "This is an increase of 20,000,000 in four years." In the last year (1908) there was a decrease of $17,998,072 in excise collections and a decrease of 41,000,000 gallons in the production of distilled spirits. At this rate one can almost figure just how long a time must elapse before the whole country is emancipated from the drink curse.

—REV. MR. MUNHALL, the well-known evangelist, and Professor Lowe have just concluded an eight weeks' evangelistic mission in "the zone," on the Isthmus of Panama. Many Christians have received help, encouragement and blessing. The seven chapels built by the government for divine service were large enough for all requirements. At one of the services several men took their stand for Christ. Missionary J. H. Sohey writes: "Possibly one-third of the people here from the States were church members at home, or closely connected with the churches; yet when they come here they drift, degenerate, and are lost in the crowd who follow pleasure, card playing, gambling and other practices. Baseball is the great god of 'the zone' on the Lord's Day. In one place, while Dr. Munhall was preaching, the excitement and noise were such that the church windows were closed that we might hear the preacher. During week-night services, in the clubhouse over the chapel dancing and other diversions were indulged in, which made it difficult to worship. What we need is a Pentecost, a mighty outpouring of the Holy Spirit. The United States Government should make it possible for the canal employees to have Saturday afternoon for pleasure and games. Then men would in larger numbers become worshipers of God on the Lord's Day. A much larger percentage of colored people attend worship on the Lord's Day than white people. The example of many of the white population is far from elevating."

—MISSIONARY A. R. STARK, of Callao, Peru, writes: "Your kind letter of September 24, enclosing a donation for $50, has been awaiting acknowledgment. We have just closed the most successful year's service of the fifteen spent for the spread of the Gospel in South America. Our total circulation of the Word of God passes 40,000 copies, and our gifts from merchants and others on the coast toward the maintenance of the work exceeds $1,000. The year has not been without its cares and burdens, but we are encouraged when we remember the generous responses and kindly sympathy of friends, among which we warmly appreciate the valuable gifts of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Surely few religious papers have the same world-wide influence that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD enjoys. A cable in El Diario (the government paper of Peru) conveyed the message of your magnificent gift to the earthquake sufferers in Italy. This is indeed a fine object lesson of the generosity and true Christian philanthropy of a strong Protestant journal toward sufferers in a Roman Catholic country. This is a unique illustration and, we believe, without a parallel in the history of Roman Catholicism. At the same time it forms an important point of influence on behalf of our Gospel work in a Roman Catholic country, where no religious liberty exists. Peru is the only republic which still hesitates to throw open the door of full religious liberty to Protestant missionary enterprise. The various native evangelical congregations in Peru must worship behind closed doors. Moreover, our fellow-workers and colporteurs in the provinces have to suffer considerable persecution. Only last month my devoted colporteur, Fernando Herrera, while on his way to Huanuco was attacked by the cura (priest) of Ambo, while selling his books. He was badly beaten, had $50 worth of books burned in the public square and was then expelled from the town by the priest. On reaching Huanuco the political authority prohibited the circulation of the Bible and threatened to imprison Herrera."

"He That Winneth Souls Is Wise"

WHAT a splendid record of Christian achievement is that of Bishop James Mills Thoburn, who has just completed his fiftieth year of service for God in India! It is a story to impress young minds with a burning desire to be consecrated to the Lord's work, which gives greater satisfaction for time and eternity than any other. There never was a period when grander or vaster opportunities were open to those possessing the equipment of youth, zeal, practical training and soul-consecration than those that are open to-day. India, China, Africa, South America, the islands of the sea, as fields for missionary labor, are a hundredfold more inviting than in earlier years. Much of the arduous pioneer work has been successfully accomplished, and the element of personal danger and discomfort, where it exists at all, is no longer, as formerly, a menace to life and action. Truly, the field is white and calling loudly for workers. Since Bishop Thoburn's first service, a great change has come over the face of the whole world. The rough places have been made smooth, and many doors of opportunity are now standing open wide, where he and his contemporaries found them shut. He is one of those brave souls who have made an open highway around the earth for the Gospel forces of the future. It is the life-work of such men that brings us measurably nearer to that day when the whole world will have received the message of salvation.

Christianity's Onward March

A WESTERN professor, who has already distinguished himself as an opponent of Christianity, and who some time ago wrote a book in which he foreshadowed the decline of the Christian religion, has just completed another work following the same line of attack. For the book itself, its merits or faults, we confess we have little interest. It is surprising, however, in this well-informed age and with an abundance of reliable statistics available, that an author should close his eyes to the facts and prefer to champion gross and palpable error.

Turner, the historian, in his Sacred History of the World, gives these figures as illustrating the growth of Christianity during the centuries:

First century	500,000 adherents
Second century	2,000,000 adherents
Third century	5,000,000 adherents
Fourth century	10,000,000 adherents
Fifth century	15,000,000 adherents
Sixth century	20,000,000 adherents
Seventh century	24,000,000 adherents
Eighth century	30,000,000 adherents
Ninth century	40,000,000 adherents
Tenth century	50,000,000 adherents
Eleventh century	70,000,000 adherents
Twelfth century	80,000,000 adherents
Thirteenth century	75,000,000 adherents
Fourteenth century	80,000,000 adherents
Fifteenth century	100,000,000 adherents
Sixteenth century	125,000,000 adherents
Seventeenth century	155,000,000 adherents
Eighteenth century	200,000,000 adherents

Turner's estimate goes no farther, but we have the figures of a recognized authority, M. Fournier de Flaix, who, as the result of the most elaborate and painstaking inquiry, gives the total estimated number of Christians in the world at the present time at 477,080,158. This leaves the figures for the nineteenth century probably near the 300,000,000 mark. M. de Flaix gives the present status of the world's religions thus:

Hinduism	190,000,000 souls
Buddhism	147,000,000 souls
Confucianism	256,000,000 souls
Shintoism	14,000,000 souls
Judaism	7,186,000 souls
Taoism	43,000,000 souls
Mohammedanism	176,000,000 souls
Polytheism (many gods)	117,681,669 souls
Christianity	477,080,158 souls

The nineteenth century witnessed a greater advance in Christianity than any of its predecessors. It was this century which saw the birth of foreign missions and the rapid growth of that great evangelizing movement which is surely destined to take the world for Christ. One century ago, there were less than 150 Christian missionaries in heathen lands. In 1895, according to the trustworthy estimate of Rev. Dr. Leonard in his Hundred Years of Missions, there were 12,000 Christian mission stations in heathen lands, with 11,000 white missionaries and 40,000 native missionary helpers, making a total force of over 50,000 workers. To-day there are 16,618 white Protestant missionaries in the field and 75,281 native missionary helpers, a total force aggregating over 90,000 missionary workers. This is the growth of a single century, but it is a most marvelous growth. In that time practically all the heathen lands have thrown open their doors to the Gospel.

Christianity dying out? No; it is heathenism, paganism and infidelity that are dying. The Church of Christ is on the advance all along the line. Witness the recent great revivals, whose echoes are still resounding in our own land, East, West and South, and in Canada, in Great Britain, and distant Australia.

Can any one, seeing these things, knowing these facts and realizing the tremendous truth that a divine purpose is behind and underneath all of these developments, doubt that this triumphal advance will be maintained until the whole world has received the Gospel?

King Peter's Uneasy Throne

KING PETER of Servia, who has been anything but an admirable or a dignified figure as a ruler, is reported as willing to abdicate. His sole stipulation is that he be provided with an ample state pension, and, if this be granted by the Servian Skuptschina, he will gracefully retire from "the fierce light that beats around the throne." Unfortunately, the Servian people seem to have little love for Peter Karageorgevitch, whose follies have brought the nation to the verge of war. This weak and incapable king, and his hot-headed son, Crown Prince George, have humiliated in its own eyes, and in the sight of all Europe, a race which is proud of its warlike ancestry and its strong rulers. Persistence in Peter's foolish policy would doubtless have resulted in the occupation of Belgrade by Austria, the loss of Servian territory and the reduction of the little kingdom to the status of a petty principality. Peter has been more of an opera bouffe monarch than a real king. His elimination may result in one of two things: either the Powers would place a safe ruler on the throne, or Servia might risk the experiment of a republic. In the chronically unsettled condition of affairs in the Balkans this latter contingency is not only a remote one, but in any event the experiment would probably be short-lived.

Peril of the Streets

IN one day recently, in New York City, five little children were run over and badly injured by automobiles. This was the climax to a long series of such accidents, and press and people raised an emphatic protest, and the police became more active. In some cases the fault did not lie with the drivers and could not be avoided. In most, however, the drivers seem to have been overspeeding.

The other cities of the country are raising their voices against careless automobilists, and State Legislatures are taking action. The majority of those who own machines are careful drivers, and they deeply regret that the criminal recklessness of a few should bring discredit on the entire body, and it is a fact that some of the wisest laws governing the use of the auto have originated with automobile clubs in America.

One law which might be very effective would be to have a man's machine confiscated on a second offense for overspeeding. A fine and a warning would be sufficient in the first case. If a man has run down any one, and his fault is proved, his license to run a machine should be revoked. Of course, it is realized that in some parts of our great cities the lot of a driver is far from a happy one. The children play in the roadway and dash recklessly in front of any vehicle. Even going slowly a man may find his nerve taxed to prevent disaster. It is to be hoped that the day when municipal playgrounds will be found in every crowded locality is not far distant. The children then would have somewhere else to vent their energies than on the streets, which are full of physical and, it may be added, moral peril as well.

Is Life Growing Longer?

SEVERAL of our contemporaries recently chronicled the fact that Mr. John Bigelow, in his ninety-second year, had sailed on an outgoing steamship to renew his acquaintance with Europe. Mr. Bigelow, hale and hearty although beyond ninety, has habitually entertained his friends in his old home in New York as hospitably as when he was younger, has greeted relatives as cheerily as in former times, and has kept up his daily reading and writing, asking no odds of time. Mr. Bigelow was United States Consul-General in Paris from 186 to 1865, and American Minister to France from 1865 to 1867. In public life he was known for intrepidity, courage and discretion. He has been a man of conspicuous ability and fidelity throughou his long and honored life. It is pleasing to think o this youthful old American gentleman daring th Atlantic, and paying a visit to the place where h wrought so well in the meridian of his powers.

Is life growing longer? Certainly it ought t increase, and length of days should be our portio now that life is easier than of old, and we under stand as never before the laws of health. Both me and women are entitled to longevity if they liv rightly, keep on working, and refuse to think o themselves as feeble, simply because they starte earlier than the crowd of young folks around them

The Strength of the Nation

IN the best of books we find this phrase: "Th king himself is served by the field." The re strength of this nation is not found in its gre cities, with their shifting population and the ince sant roar of their activity. The quiet, steadfas enduring strength on which we build must l sought for among the farming communities, when comes the life-blood of the town. Could a canva be made of the men who to-day lead the van statesmanship, in science and commerce, a gre majority of the foremost in the ranks would l shown to have had their start in the rural district The country continually feeds the town.

It has been pointed out that an unjust distinctio is often made in literature between the people the country and those of the town. It is natur that those who reside in the country should rese the common habit into which authors fall of inv riably making their characters speak in a ru dialect, with uncertain English, if they happen belong to the village or the outlying farm. T fashion came in, shall we say, with those maste of literature who described the peasantry of the c world. It belonged to days when there were telephones, no motor cars, no swiftly-plying trai It belonged to the days when education was t costly for the common purse. Those days are f in the background. To-day there is no legitima place for caste in a free republic. We are all serv by the field.

Opium Congress at Shanghai

ONE of the most important gatherings of the world was that of the Opium Congress, which recently held its sessions in Shanghai. The nations taking part included China, Japan, Great Britain, France, Germany, Holland and Turkey. The Congress met under an invitation issued by the United States to consider ways and means to control the traffic in the use of opium and morphine. The commission was opened by a speech from the Viceroy Tuan-Fang, who claimed that the cultivation of the poppy in China had already been largely reduced and that the consumption of the drug had been diminished by one-half. The action of China in herself restricting the use of opium within her own borders has completely altered the aspect of the question within the last few years, and the restriction of the importation of Indian opium into China seems now inevitable. One day, after the opening of the commission, the importation of opium into the United States became illegal. Although great progress has been made in fighting this national habit there are still thirteen millions of people who are addicted to it, at a cost of $120,000,000 a year. The financial burden of opium alone is greater than that of the land tax of China. There is a powerful anti-opium crusade being carried on in Canton and other cities of China, and anti-opium societies are being formed in the villages. The members wear a badge and sign a pledge. The Chinese government, having determined to destroy the opium habit in ten years, has made good progress in the last two, and it is sincerely to be hoped that in the eight years to come it will complete the work contemplated of entirely obliterating the traffic and habit. And it behooves the Christian nations represented in the Congress, and all other civilized peoples, to give the Chinese empire their energetic moral support. The ablest statesmen of England insist that, valuable as the business of the importation of opium into China from India is, it should be prohibited in the interest of humanity, government and good morals. Opium is a poison, which does its deadly work more rapidly than alcohol. The average user of opium lasts but three years. The heart of the world cries against this abomination of desolation.

Therefore shall ye keep mine ordinance, that ye commit not any one of these abominable customs, and that ye defile not yourselves therein. (Lev. 18:30.)

The Two Processions

The first procession was on the recent reopening of the British Parliament. A telegram from London thus graphically describes the exercises:

The Prince and Princess of Wales, in their glass coach, came from Marlborough House with an escort of Royal Horse Guards and preceded by three coaches, inside of which were the lords and equerries and ladies in waiting. Last of all the carriages came the royal coach, with its eight beautiful cream ponies ridden by postilions and walking men, exactly as in the days of George III. The coach was a blaze of vivid color. Except the crimson roof and the painted panels, every part of the quaintly carved open body was heavily gilded, while the interior, plainly seen through the large plate-glass windows, was richly upholstered in rose pink satin. As it passed one caught a glimpse of such ermine, the gleam of diamonds and two smiling faces as King Edward and Queen Alexandra bowed right and left in acknowledgment of their subjects' greeting. The booming of cannon, the national anthem played in quick time, accompanied the royal progress, and only stopped when the King and Queen alighted and went inside to greet their faithful Lords and Commons. In the robing room the King put on the royal robes; then he and the Queen, preceded and followed by various officials, walked through the royal gallery into the Painted Chamber of the House of Lords. Lord Crewe bore the imperial crown, Lord Carrington the sword of state. When the House of Lords was reached the King handed the Queen to the throne, then seated himself.

In another part of the city of London, a mile or more away from this gorgeous pageant, a different procession marched. Five thousand unemployed women and children, gaunt, ragged and dirty, marched through the streets. They carried cheap banners, and one cart brought up the rear, with the picture of an Englishman's home, without any furniture and dilapidated in the extreme. They marched along in silence, many of them with babies in their arms, to the Horticultural Hall, where they had been promised milk and sandwiches. It had been planned, by the Committee of the Unemployed, to furnish a complete contrast to the royal procession, and to emphasize the vast difference between the social extremes of London, and the necessity of some immediate and permanent relief.

It will be well for the statesmen of England and the world at large, ourselves included, to set more energetically and successfully to the task of adjusting these social inequalities, that cause so much suffering and unrest. The British Lords refused to pass the licensing bill, and thus piled up barriers of poverty and crime. The Christly spirit and the use of the Golden Rule in human conduct will eventually adjust the industrial difficulties of London and the other cities of the world.

The Anti-Opium Congress Which Met Recently in Shanghai

Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them. (Matt. 7:12.)

Pure Food Law

Man's cupidity has prompted him to pretty nearly every kind of deceit. He has put sand in his sugar, gravel in his raisins, lard in his butter, water in his milk. He has used chemicals of every kind for adulteration, and dyes of every hue for deception. The frauds became so general that the government enacted stringent laws against harmful adulterations and impurities of food, compelling the manufacturers and merchants dealing in the different kinds of wares to label their articles, and visiting heavy penalties upon those selling one article under the pretense that it is another one.

There has been quite a discussion of late as to what kind of preservatives could be used under the law, with meats, vegetables and fruits. Dr. H. W. Wiley, Chief of the Bureau of Chemicals of the Department of Agriculture, in a recent address on this subject said:

"There is a mistaken notion that preservatives are necessary. There is not a single article of food which in any way is necessary to human nutrition and happiness which cannot be offered for consumption in its best state, without the use of any chemical preservative. The experience of reputable manufacturers has shown that all food products for which it is claimed preservatives are a necessity can be manufactured and supplied to the consumer without such adventitious aid."

Dr. Wiley, in his address, condemns the debasing of food in order to make it cheap for the laboring man, and says that he is robbed when he is given spice which is two-thirds flour, and catsup made from the sweepings of the floor of the tomato factory. Secretary Wilson, in his annual report, reports great improvement in the enforcement of the Pure Food Law; that the government laboratories have been increased in one year from six to twenty-one, that over 13,000 samples have been examined by the inspectors and that over 800 prosecutions were brought and only two of these were lost. Adulterated flour, coffee, molasses, honey, cider, vinegar, wine, beer, canned fruits and vegetables in enormous quantities were seized and confiscated by the government. The Pure Food Law cannot make men honest in heart, but it can prevent dishonest men from practising their iniquities upon a long-suffering and deluded public. The man who takes the chicken off the roost, or the ham off the hook, and goes to jail is no more a thief than those well-dressed, polite manufacturers and merchants who extract money by false pretenses. The Pure Food Law is a good one, and has not come any too early.

Therefore I esteem all thy precepts concerning all things to be right; and I hate every false way. (Ps. 119:128.)

Wood Pulp Production Increased

Dean George D. Frankforter, of the College of Chemistry in the University of Minnesota, claims to have made a discovery by which wood pulp in the United States will be increased one hundred-fold and the question of cheap paper solved for generations to come. After twelve years of experimentation, Dr. Frankforter describes his perfected process as placing small pieces of waste wood or sawdust on a steel incline, over a furnace, and forcing distillation of the waste wood by saturating it fully with carbon disulphide or gasoline, thus causing the turpentine and rosin to pass off as gases and leaving wood pulp, free from pitch and perfectly adapted to the manufacture of paper. The doctor extracted from one cord of Norway pine, worth $7.50, turpentine worth $41 and wood pulp worth $39—a yield of $80 in all. Dr. Frankforter, in walking through the pine woods in Northern Minnesota in 1897, noticed an old stump which gave out an odor unlike that of ordinary turpentine. He took a piece of the stump back to the university and began to experiment. Within a week he hit upon the present process, which later he perfected at a small experimental plant, erected near his home. The tendency of modern science and invention is to utilize waste forces and tremendously increase the valuable product, and more and more the Church must set herself to work to use the unused material, to employ the idle resources, and greatly multiply the religious productiveness of its members.

Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost. (John 6:12.)

April eleventh to thirteenth celebrating the Fiftieth Anniversary of Bishop James M. Thoburn's sailing for India

Native Women Workers

AT Allegheny College, Pennsylvania, this week, a large and representative gathering, including men of note from different parts of the Union, assembled to do honor to one who, once a student in that seat of learning, has since attained to world-wide fame as one of the greatest missionaries of this age.

James Mills Thoburn was born at St. Clairsville, O., in 1836. He gave evidence early in life of a desire for a missionary career, and after completing his school studies entered Allegheny College, where he was graduated in 1857. After a two years' ministerial experience in Ohio and Pennsylvania, the young preacher felt clearly the call to foreign mission service, and early in 1859 he was appointed as a missionary to India. The celebration at Allegheny College marks the rounding out of his fiftieth year of service in that country—a record of continuous, consecrated, successful effort, which has hardly a parallel.

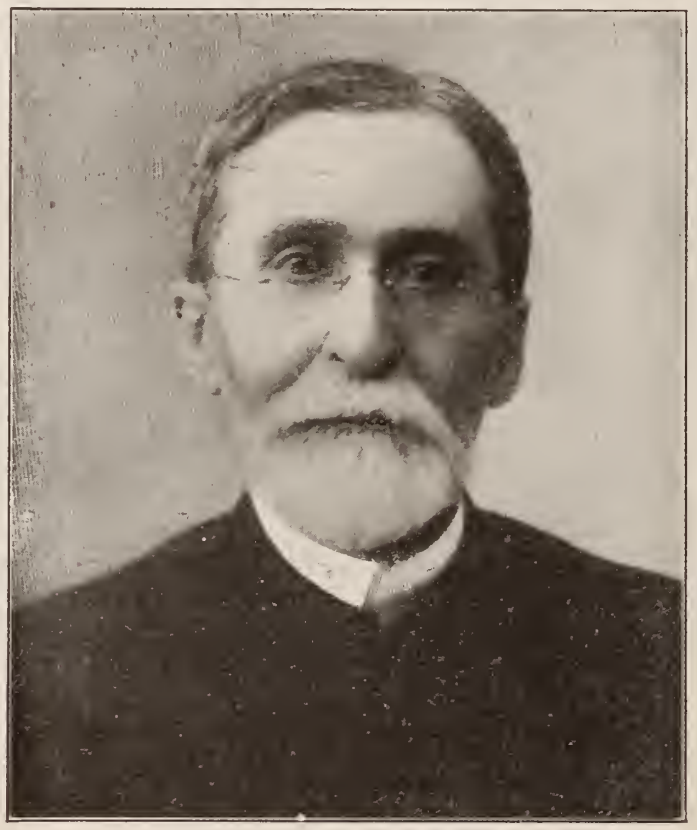
Young Thoburn—for he was only twenty-three when he sailed from New York on the long 127-day voyage to Calcutta, via the Cape of Good Hope—was stationed successively at Naini Tal, Pauri, Moradabad, Lucknow, Calcutta and Simla.

When he began work in India, of the 300,000,000 population in that vast empire only some 2,000,000 were Christians, the great majority being Hindus, Mohammedans, Buddhists, Parsees and votaries of other native religions. He soon learned the language and began preaching in Hindustani with marked success. In his fifth year the death of Mrs. Thoburn, his wife, necessitated his return to this country with his child; but his heart was with India, and he soon went back to his favorite field. After a time he was appointed presiding elder of the province of Oudh. When he had been thirteen years in service he voluntarily relinquished the salary he was receiving from the Methodist Missionary Society and decided to trust God for his support—a movement which subsequent events fully justified. In 1874 he was sent to Calcutta, where there was no Methodist mission. He held Gospel services in the largest theatre in the city, and the people flocked to hear the inspired appeals of the eloquent American preacher. Conversions multiplied quickly, and the foundation of a great religious work was laid. Many churches and schools have sprung up there since, and Calcutta is now the gathering place of an important annual conference.

His next station was at Rangoon, in Burma, where within a month after his first service he organized a Methodist church, with over sixty members. A little later he went still farther—to Singapore, nearly 2,000 miles from Calcutta—where he labored a month and organized a church. From this foundation also, as in Calcutta, a great spiritual blessing has come, and the Malaysian Conference (which includes the Philippines) is one of its outgrowths. Thus, through the consecrated efforts of one devout and well-equipped man of God, great centres of evangelism have been founded among the heathen, and Christian churches whose congregations aggregate thousands of earnest believers.

In 1888, the Methodist Church fittingly recognized the missionary's great ability by appointing him a bishop. This honor did not make him proud; it simply impelled him to work harder than before. He had now pastoral authority over extensive areas, with the power to choose men and place them in the field where they could render the best service, and in his judgment of men it is universally admitted that Bishop Thoburn has few rivals. All his appointees were men of the strongest Christian character, fearless, aggressive, yet wise and capable; men of excellent training, fitted either for the pulpit or the school.

Bishop Thoburn has always been a warm advocate of the extension of woman's work in missionary lands. When his sister, Miss Isabella Thoburn, went to India in 1869 as the first woman missionary of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and opened a school for girls in a little room adjoining a bazaar in Lucknow, she found the field ripe for such a work. She began with eight pupils, but soon scores were clamoring for admission to her classes. The fame of her great brother was of inestimable advantage to her at this juncture. Soon the need became apparent for a collegiate department, and in 1887 the Woman's College at Lucknow, which she founded, was formally opened. Since then it has graduated hundreds of girls who are now pastors' wives, zenana teachers, village Gospel workers and Bible readers. She founded also a chain of day schools and Sunday Schools, and long before she passed away, in 1901, the missionary world had acknowledged that Isabella Thoburn's name was one worthy to stand beside that of her distinguished brother, who had taken so deep an interest in her labors.



Bishop James Mills Thoburn

One of the most eventful chapters of Bishop Thoburn's long life in India, to which he frequently refers with deep emotion, was his experience during the great famine of 1897-98. When the readers of this journal began to pour in their gifts in aid of the starving multitudes, Bishop Thoburn, at the request of Dr. Klopsch, cabled his consent to act as chairman of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Interdenominational Famine Relief Committee. In that capacity he rendered splendid service to the relief movement. Associated with him were many of the best and most devoted missionaries in India, representing all the leading Protestant denominations. Through their energetic, consecrated labors, in wisely using the fund our readers had placed at their disposal, hundreds of thousands of lives were saved. Toward the close of 1899, when there were indications of another famine, Bishop Thoburn wrote to this journal:

"It is not strange that, as the dark shadow of this impending calamity begins to come over us again, the hearts of all connected with the suffering districts turn toward THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as if prompted by a natural instinct. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has become known throughout the world as the helper of those who chanced to be in sore need. It is not very strange that the missionaries of India remember that, in one form and another, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent $400,000 to aid the famishing millions of India during the recent visitation of famine in that stricken country. Its readers have shown by their generosity that they are followers of Him who had 'compassion on the multitude.'" Later, in connection with the relief of another famine, and with the organization of the greatest orphanage work the world has ever known, for the shelter, support and training of 5,500 helpless little waifs, left parentless by the famine, the same committee, though under a different chairman, expended nearly $1,200,000 more which had been contributed by godly American men and women, through this journal.

Bishop Thoburn's health gave way in 1899 under the continuous strain of labor in a tropical climate, and for a time he was compelled to rest. But when the wished-for physical improvement came, he returned to work with all the zest and energy of his earlier years. His record in India is a succession of spiritual victories. The two conferences he founded have now become nine conferences, with members and probationers aggregating 200,000. When he first set foot in India there were just thirteen Methodist members and probationers in that country. No man can estimate the numbers of souls that have been reached directly and indirectly by the message delivered through this great missionary and those who labored under his care. His life has been truly given to India, and he must be accorded a high rank among the great soul-winners of this missionary age.

In the intervals of his multifarious missionary labors Bishop Thoburn has found time for authorship. He has written many books that are valuable helps to missionary workers, besides being instructive to readers at home. Among his best known volumes are: My Missionary Apprenticeship, India and Malaysia, Light in the East, Christless Nations, The Church of Pentecost, Life of Isabella Thoburn, The Deaconess and Her Vocation, Missionary Sermons, and The Christian Conquest of India.

MY FRIEND, THE BEDOUIN SHEIK

By O. E. MOFFET

A Group of Bedouins

Defenders of the Encampment

Bedouin Women Churning Butter

In the Gipsy Encampment

MY first introduction to the Bedouins was east of the Lake of Galilee. Our train from Damascus to Haifa had glided down into the little river of Yarmuk. It was beautiful down there, that spring day. Wild poppies in places made the valley crimson. The great hills, nearly a thousand feet high, were clad in fresh grass or small oak. I was in the country of the Gadarenes, where dwelt the demoniac from whom Christ cast a legion of devils.

It was a foolish thing to do; but I stepped off that train when it stopped in a solitary place; for the little river as it sang over its bed of boulders had tempted me. There were certainly fish there, and they rose readily to the fly. I became so absorbed that I must have followed the river several miles, when I became wearied of the sport and sat down under a poplar tree to rest. Then I began to realize that I was a stranger in a strange land, and in the midst of a people said to be utterly reckless of the property rights of others. I must have been twenty miles east of Tiberias, and the passenger train went west only twice a week. I had a blanket and provisions in my knapsack, and I knew there were several little stations down the road where one might find shelter.

In Marseilles I had bought me a queer thing—combination of skillet, coffee-pot, bake-pan and water heater, that folds up like a puzzle and fits the coat pocket. I was hungry. A small fire was kindled of dry twigs, fish broiled, coffee made, and these, with the good things brought from the hotel in Damascus, were laid out on a great palm leaf.

I was not destined to eat that meal alone. Just as I sat down, a Bedouin appeared from over a hill, and came toward me. The word "Bedouin" means "desert man." They are the descendants of Ishmael, and are said to be robbers and outlaws to this day. This one came down from the top of a cliff, leaping from stone to stone as gracefully as a deer. He was well made, lean, sinewy and active. His eyes were well formed, and expressed both daring and cunning. His face was the color of a ripe chestnut. His white head-cloth, or haikh, the inner side striped with brown, flowed down below his shoulders and was held in place by a camel's hair braid, bound twice around his shapely head. His feet were shod in bright red slippers. As he approached, his long gun seemed to be held ready to lift to his shoulder, in case I made a hostile demonstration. On he came till within six feet of me, and I will never forget the half amused, half frightened expression of his eyes. I had learned several Arabic expressions. One was "Break bread"; and now using it, I motioned him to sit down. He smiled, showing very even, white teeth, and I never knew before how a smile could relieve one's anxiety.

After hesitating, and apparently thinking it over for a moment, he accepted the invitation, and there by the dashing little river the Ishmaelite and I broke bread together. The French bread, pickles, jelly and canned beef seemed to be great curiosities to him. Probably he had never tasted the like before.

He examined my string of fish in great astonishment, and by gestures asked how I caught them. I showed him my fly and rod, and he puzzled and wondered over them. Then taking the rod, I made a cast and was lucky enough to get a fish. When the Ishmaelite caught the idea that the fish took the bunch of feathers for a fly and bit at it he was almost beside himself with glee. By signs he invited me to come with him to his tent, where we would cook the fish and eat.

Just then a hand-car, loaded with native workmen, came down the track and stopped near us. I had been told that each section gang had a European boss; so motioning my Bedouin to come with me, we went to the car and found it in charge of a German. I told him how I met my companion, and asked if it would be safe to visit his tent. He informed me that I would be as safe there as at my own home, now since I had eaten with him. He explained that such was their way of making a compact of friendship and brotherhood.

This German spoke Arabic, and through him the Bedouin told me we would go an hour's journey to the tent of his nephew, and remain there over night. On the morrow we would go to his village, four hours' journey to the north. He said he regarded me as a very clever man, since I could "lie to the fishes with feathers." It had not occurred to me before that fishing was a species of deception.

We found the nephew's tent in a field of great white flowers. One end of the tent was cluttered up with ropes, saddles, bridles, bundles and boxes. The other end, which was partitioned off by a curtain, was evidently arranged for a guest chamber. There

D. M. P., Westport, Calif. 1. Which city in the United States has the least foreign population? 2. Is there a town in this country that is wholly made up of Americans?

1. In the tables published in the almanacs the foreign population is given for the entire country, and not by separate cities. You can get full statistics by writing to the Director of the Census, Washington, D. C. New York probably has the largest foreign population. 2. In New England there are towns where practically all are native born Americans. Probably this is true also in some places in the South.

W. H. G., Lockport, N. Y. What is the meaning of Rom. 9:13, "Esau have I hated"? I have always thought, and still think, that God hates no one; that he only hates sin, because he is love.

God is not the author of evil, and hate is the result of evil. It really means that God preferred Jacob to Esau. Paul quotes from Mal. 1:2, 3. Professor Bernhard Weiss, of Berlin, in commenting on the passage, says: "The statement there made that God bestowed his love upon Jacob and withheld it from Esau Paul does not regard as an historical description of the fate of the two sons, but we are to find in it the lesson that it was exclusively his elective grace which determined the one to salvation and excluded the other from it." God preferred one to the other.

G. L. G., Elmira, N. Y. What is the law in Minnesota in regard to the disposition of real estate, when a person dies intestate, leaving a widow but no children?

We believe the widow takes all the real estate, subject to prior liens, unless, during husband's life, she has consented to some disposition of the same in writing. But the only safe course is to ask a Minnesota lawyer.

L. B., Mississippi. Where and when was David Crockett born? Where did he die? Tell something of his life.

David Crockett was born at Limestone, Tenn., in 1786. In the Creek War of 1813-14 he commanded a battalion of mounted riflemen, under General Jackson. He was a member of the Tennessee Legislature, 1821-24, and a member of Congress, 1827-31 and 1833-35. His independence caused a break with Jackson. He entered the Texan army in the War of Independence, and was killed while holding the Alamo against overpowering numbers of Mexicans. The slogan of the Texans became "Remember the Alamo!" Crockett's motto in life was "Be sure you are right, then go ahead!" He is one of the most romantic figures in American history of the first half of the nineteenth century.

D. T., Elroy, Wis. 1. How large does the banyan tree grow? 2. To what church did Grover Cleveland belong?

1. The banyan tree, with its shoots and aerial roots, often covers an area sixty feet in diameter. 2. Grover Cleveland was a Presbyterian.

L. S., Saugerties, N. Y. How often did Jesus appear to men after his resurrection? Was Mary Magdalen the first person to behold him?

The appearances were ten in number: 1. To Mary Magdalen (reported by John and Mark). 2. To the other women (Matthew). 3. To Peter (reported by Luke and Paul). 4. To the disciples going to Emmaus (reported by Luke and Mark). 5. To the apostles, Thomas being absent (reported by Mark, Luke, John and Paul). 6. To the apostles, Thomas included (reported by John). 7. To the disciples at the Sea of Galilee (John). 8. Dr. Klopsch's Attractive Offer

Dear Friend: Here is an offer that must prove irresistible to every Patriotic American Heart within the ranks of the great Christian Herald Family. There are two objects dearer to such a heart than any other objects on earth; one is God's Holy Word, and the other the Flag of Our Country. The Bible and the American Flag! How we love them! How lightly we count life itself when the cause of either is at stake! And so it is with especial pride that, having already put within the reach of every one of our readers our Red Letter Bible—the finest edition of Holy Scripture ever issued—we now offer every Subscriber to The Christian Herald, ABSOLUTELY FREE, in return for a very slight effort on his, or her, part, a Large, Beautiful, Perfectly and Expensively Made American Flag; a flag that might well float proudly from any home in the land.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

In addition to such a flag this offer also includes two other Patriotic Premiums, all three fully described below—indeed, our present offer is unquestionably the greatest, most generous and remarkable offer ever made by this or any other paper in return for so little effort on the part of the subscriber.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

After reading the details of the two following propositions you will wonder how it is possible for us to promise all that we here do; the explanation is simply this: We are determined in the next few months to greatly enlarge the circulation of the Christian Herald and to extend its immeasurable influence for good throughout the country. Our first concern is simply to introduce our paper into new homes; and to this end we can afford to make unusual inducements, even at a financial sacrifice to ourselves. Yours most cordially,

Ellis Klopsch

No, there has never been in history such an influx of immigrants into any one country as into the United States. Immigrants began to come in noticeable numbers in the "forties," the number increased after the Civil War, then rose to a high mark in the "nineties," and since 1900 has been growing at a tremendous rate. 5. The origin of the American Indians is still a disputed question with anthropologists. There were never any people called Lamanites. They are a myth of recent invention.

C. B., Candor, N. Y. 1. Was the famous speech of Abraham Lincoln at Gettysburg made off-hand or was it composed and fixed for the occasion? 2. Was Lincoln quick at repartee and speech-making, at an instant's notice?

1. Lincoln jotted down the outline of his Gettysburg speech on the back of an envelope while on the train from Washington to Gettysburg. 2. Lincoln was very good at making a good speech at a moment's notice. He was quick "to think on his feet."

W. W. D., Sterling, Ill. Who was Charlotte Temple? What did she do?

Charlotte Temple was the heroine of a famous novel of early New York life. She was not a real personage. A Charlotte Temple buried in Trinity churchyard, New York, has been erroneously connected with this story.

J. P., Hubbard, O. When was the battle of Dorking fought?

There was never an actual battle fought at Dorking, in England. The "Battle of Dorking" was a clever account of an imaginary battle, in which supposed invaders from Germany totally defeated the British. It was printed in Blackwood's Magazine in 1871. General Sir George Chesney, the author, wished to impress on the British people the fact that the country could be invaded, and wished to stir them to provide adequate defense.

J. W., Liberty Street, San Francisco, Cal. Several years ago, when in New York, I passed an old cemetery attached to an old church on Broadway. In the cemetery was a tombstone to the memory of Captain Lawrence, with the inscription "Don't Give Up the Ship." Was this Trinity Church or St. Paul's Church, pictured on the cover of the issue of January 20?

It was Trinity Church and churchyard. St. Paul's is on the same side of Broadway, north of Trinity. St. Paul's Church was pictured on the cover of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for January 20. St. Paul's is and always has been one of the subordinate churches owned by Trinity. It also has an interesting churchyard.

C. B., Washington, D. C. I saw it stated that in countries where wild animals abound no bones of the dead are found, and it is unknown why. Is that a fact?

No; human bones are found throughout Africa. When the American Indians were the only human beings on this continent, wild beasts were found everywhere, and the discovery of ancient Indian remains is of common occurrence.

B. W. D., Cotuit, Mass. What is the population of the globe?

The estimated population is: Africa, 127,000,000; North America, 115,000,000; South America, 45,000,000; Asia, 850,000,000; Australasia, 5,200,000; Europe, 380,200,000; Polar regions, 3,000,000. Of course, parts of the above are largely conjecture, as there are many countries in which no census has ever been taken. It is based on estimates revised from those of Ernest George Rubenstein, F.R.G.S.

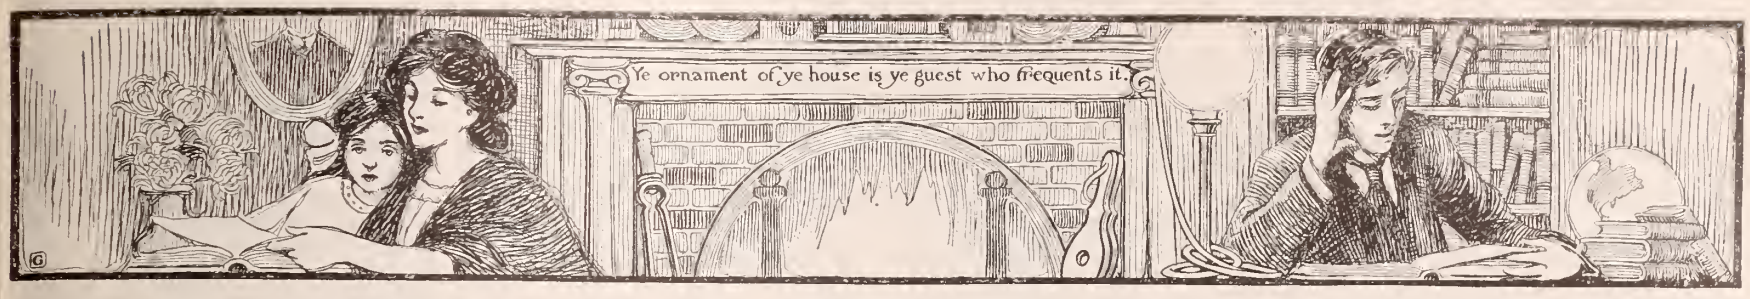
AROUND THE HOME HEARTH



Building the Nest

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

ONE of the prettiest sights of the spring, the sight of which we never grow weary, is the building of the nest. With the first warm days the birds come trooping back, and presently they are very busy with their love-making and the weaving of their little homes. There is a close analogy between the home-making of the birds and that of ourselves. Our little brothers of the air are very happy in the time when they are occupied with the care of their fledglings, and every hour of their life has its lesson for us. The mother-bird broods over the eggs, and keeps her tiny children warm beneath her wings. The father-bird works hard for a living, and has much ado to provide food enough for those hungry little mouths that always seem opening and crying out to be filled.

There are perils surrounding the nest, perils from marauding savages in the shape of boys, who in their hunt for specimens do not regard the sanctities of the homes in the branches; perils from cats who pounce upon the young birds or the parent birds, and perils sometimes from men who are not willing to spare the birds a toll from their orchards and fields. Very foolish and short-sighted are those who destroy the birds, and very churlish those who deny them their share of food; for once the birds are eliminated insect pests multiply and swift destruction comes upon the crops.

It is not so much of the birds and their nests that I thought, as I began to write this page, as of some of my friends who are young and who are thinking in these bright days about their own nest building. Where shall the young people begin their married life? Several courses are open to them, and they have the privilege of choice. Sometimes they decide to spend their first year or two with the parents of John or of Mary. Good and sufficient reasons are presented by the elder folk, who do not wish a son to leave them or who dislike to give up the company of a dear daughter. Far be it from me to say broadly that this course should never be taken, yet it is beset with many difficulties, and as a rule the newly married pair will be much wiser if they build an independent nest, be it ever so small, than if they stay under the sheltering roof of parents. Relations-in-law are often most friendly, but they do not always understand one another, and it is not well for them to be in the close companionship of the family in those early days when foundations for future happiness are laid.

Again, the balance may tip in favor of life for a while in a boarding-house, because little money has been saved and the young couple hope, by economizing in this way, to make a better start by and by in the housekeeping line. The objection to life in a boarding-house is twofold. It admits of little privacy and it entails on both husband and wife few obligations beyond the payment of the weekly or monthly sum agreed upon as a quid pro quo. The young wife has a great deal of leisure upon her hands and the young husband has no opportunity to undertake the duties and responsibilities that fall upon the householder.

If possible, the newly wedded young people of this reason should at once begin their united lives in the sweet solitude of a little home entirely their own. It may be only two or three rooms that they can afford, but if they start with a capital of love, health and industry, the little home will be a very heaven on earth. By and by, if they are frugal and if the Lord prospers them, they may be able to live in more commodious quarters. Their aim should be, as soon as practicable, to become the owners of their home, and to this end they should try to secure a piece of ground on which they may build. If the husband's business demands his living in a large city, this may be impossible for some years; but a beautiful home nest may be made in a very tiny flat, tucked away in one of the great apartment houses that are everywhere rising in our cities. In these spring days one can but wish to the newly married pair the happiness that comes to the birds in their nests on the waving boughs. We sing and we think, as we sing, that the happiness of no home is quite complete until we can croon to rest a little stranger who lies close in the mother's arms. Then we say, as we sing a lullaby,

Rockaby, baby, on the tree top,

Where did you come from, baby dear?
Out of the everywhere into the here.

MONTAGUES AND CAPULETS

EVERY reader of Shakespeare recalls the loves of Romeo and Juliet, when confronted with the words Capulet and Montague. Feuds between families often last from one generation to another in mountain regions, where the primitive passions rage and where hereditary hatred is considered a virtue. These feuds have been transmitted from father to son in our own country, in the mountain fastnesses of the South and sometimes in those of the North. The pretty picture shows the end of such a feud between two families in the islands of the Grecian Archipelago. The betrothal of two little children, a boy and a girl, signifies that the estrangement has terminated, that hereafter amicable relations will prevail, that, in short, the hatchet is buried. This happy conclusion is occasionally reached in America, not by the betrothal of children in infancy, but by the falling in love of two young people who have decided that out of all the world they will choose each other, caring for neither the pride of the Montagues nor the scorn of the Capulets.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—J. V. S. A man who wishes to become a trained nurse should seek to get accurate information as to the nearest hospital where he may receive the requisite training. There is certainly a place for men in this beneficent work, both as attendants on nervous patients and as caretakers of men, although the profession has more recruits from women than from the other sex.

Privileges of a Mother-in-law

WHAT are the privileges of a mother-in-law? We will suppose her to be either the husband's or the wife's mother, and a permanent inmate of the family. There ought certainly to be no friction in such an arrangement, and everybody ought to get on comfortably from morning until night. Surely there is no one who should be so tactful, affectionate and considerate as an elderly woman, who has borne the heat and burden of the day and has learned that to bear and forbear are the first obligations of life when people live in the same household. Yet tempers are incompatible now and then when sisters are the parties concerned, and for some strange reason a mother-in-law is not always an angel of peace in the home. Quoting from a recital made by a sufferer the other day, I show the reader a case in point. Here is a gentlewoman in the prime of life, with a little money of her own in the bank and enough income at all times to cover her current expenses. She has many friends and relatives, and is made welcome as a guest when she chooses to visit among them.

As a visitor she appears to be perfect, but when she returns to the abode where she is domiciled, she at once begins to act as an irritant. A mustard-plaster would perhaps be the best simile to represent her effect on the family. She stirs up the children by constant antagonism and reproof, interfering with their mother's management, and criticising both parents freely. She uses at her discretion the individual property of the rest, drawing from their desks whatever stationery and postage stamps she requires, preparing extra meals for herself at her pleasure, and availing herself of the horse and phaeton without the ceremony of asking if this be convenient. Surely a mother-in-law who thus usurps the rights of others is not likely to be productive of harmony. Still, she is mother and grandmother, and as such is entitled to a measure of respect and a good deal of toleration. Very likely most of her infringements are due to thoughtlessness. She is the oldest person in the house and fancies herself immune from those rules of courtesy that govern well-bred people. Whether she be the mother of the wife or of the husband makes no difference; she is a cause of dissension, and it would be better for all if she lived elsewhere. Old and infirm people and the very poor must be borne with by their relatives; but if a man or woman has means enough to pay his or her way, and if it is plain that the home would be happier in the absence of either, the line of duty appears to be evident, though to indicate it would be an ungracious task.

"Lavish in its Gifts"

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The book, After Death, What? also the beautiful pictures, duly received. I anticipate great pleasure and profit in the perusal of the book. The pictures are certainly fine, and have been very much admired. Certainly THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is lavish in its gifts, as I have found in the past four years.

Plea for Japan's Famine Orphans

By Rev. Wm. E. Lampe, Sendai, Japan

IN the winter of 1905-06 the northeastern part of Japan was visited by a famine which attracted world-wide sympathy and has made the name of Sendai well known. One result of this famine was to leave many hundreds of children destitute and in need of prompt relief. Old Japan had no orphanages, but Christian missionary work introduced them. At the time of this famine, there was not yet any orphanage in Japan north of Tokyo.

The readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERAIL are known throughout the world for their good works, and more than half of all the money contributed for the relief of the hundreds of thousands of famine-stricken Japanese three years ago was raised through their efforts. The final remittance of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ($25,000 in gold, or 50,000 yen) came at a time of urgent necessity, and was divided equally between the Okayama Orphanage and the Sendai Orphanage. The Okayama Orphanage is a Christian institution, founded more than ten years ago by Mr. Ishii. It received more than 800 children from the famine region, thus more than doubling its already large family; it is now the fourth largest in the world.

The Sendai Orphanage was opened during the famine, right in the centre of the famine region, and received exclusively famine children. It is thus distinctly a famine orphanage, and a monument of the Christian love manifested during the dark days of three years ago. The Foreign Committee of Relief, of which I was chairman, was able to turn a goodly number of contributions into the treasury of the new orphanage, besides the large one of $12,500 already referred to as the gift of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. One American church bought a tract of land and an unused school building, which was the only home the 261 orphans had for more than a year. It was found necessary to build cottages, each providing for 25 children. These were inexpensive buildings, and were erected with funds given by individuals, or by missions, or by interested persons in different denominations in America.

The generous gift of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, used entirely for the maintenance of the children, and the many smaller gifts for the same purpose, furnished support for these several hundred children during the three years that have elapsed since then. The intention had been to try to gradually return the children to those who would care for them, so that by the time the funds in hand should be exhausted all of them would be provided for. Conditions have been such in Japan, however, that it has been impossible to return more than a few. We still have 223 children, with little prospect of returning any more of them. Their ages are from eight to fourteen, although a few are even younger.

The funds were entirely exhausted several months ago, and the situation with which we are now confronted is simply this: Either we must disband the orphanage, turning the children back toward their former homes, where there is no one to care for them, or we must look for their provision to those who love them, because of the Master who loves us all.

It is but natural that at this time we turn again to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Ours being the only institutional work of the kind in all the northern part of Japan, we cannot bear the thought of giving it up. The plant has been provided, a strong interdenominational committee, made up of representatives of nine American churches, has been formed to manage the institution and train the children for Christ, and we look to generous America to help care for these children until they are able to provide for themselves.

The experience of the past few years shows that $6,000, or a little more, per year is necessary to maintain the orphanage. The Japanese, Christians and non-Christians alike, already love the orphanage and will give as they are able toward its support. If 223 CHRISTIAN HERALD readers will each give $20 a year it will be possible, I think, to secure in other ways whatever else is necessary and thus prevent the abandonment of this Christlike work. Will not THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers help us at this time?

WILLIAM E. LAMPE.

Will You Care for One of These Orphans?

ON the opposite page (p. 334) will be found the photographs of some forty-eight little Japanese orphan boys and girls, who are being kept at the Sendai Orphanage, in the hope that some kind patrons in the United States may be found willing to become, in a spiritual sense, their god-fathers and god-mothers, and provide for their support during the next few years. These little ones have no homes to which they might be sent, and as there is no provision whatsoever for their support in the orphanage the managers are at a loss how to proceed. They were taken in at the close of the famine, cleaned, fed and cared for generally. They have been taught to be Christian children, and there is little doubt that, if spared, many of them might become preachers, evangelists or teachers of the Gospel.

There are at Sendai 223 orphans, just like these, We would be pleased to hear from any of our readers who are interested in this beautiful child-saving work and who may desire to assume the care of one little orphan boy or girl. The expense would be $20 a year (equal to about 40 cents a week), and payments could be made either quarterly or half-yearly, through this journal. There would be no obligation to continue the support, and the patron would be quite free to withdraw at the end of a year if he or she wished to do so; but we have seen so much of joy and blessing come to the benefactors in work of this class that we are confident that, once begun, you will find it a great pleasure and privilege to go on. The letters from your little protegé, the prayers that will ascend from the baby lips for the foster-father or foster-mother far away, will make you realize that the tie that binds the little orphan to you is a very real one indeed and that a young heart loves you with a deep and fervent love, which is all the more intense because it owes so much to you. And while you may never go to the mission field yourself, it is a very strong probability that your little heathen foster-child may some day stand in your stead, as your substitute, winning souls to Christ.

If you are interested, and wish to have a share in the work, write at once to Japanese Orphan Work, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

What It Is to Be a Christian

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

IN the Golden Text, Acts 11:26, we read that the disciples were first called Christians at Antioch. Who called them so? Not themselves, not their friends, but their opposers, in mockery. It was the very name which God would have them bear, the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, by which the family on earth and in heaven is named (Eph. 3:15).

O Antioch, thou teacher of the world!
From out thy portals passed the feet of those
Who banished and despised have made thy name
The next in rank to proud Jerusalem.
Within thy gates the persecuted few,
Who dared to rally round the holy cross,
And worship him whose sacred form it bore,
Were first called Christians; in thy sad conceit
Thou madst a stigma of reproach and shame
This noblest title of the sons of earth; [known,
While, save for this, thy name were scarcely
Except among the mouldering vestiges
Of dim antiquity. —J. L. CHESTER.

Alexander the Great said to one who had been named after him, but was unworthy, "Either change your character or your name." Let us beware of that guilty hypocrisy that accepts the name, but refuses to accept the nature, of Christ. A jewelry salesman, noticing his hands to be somewhat soiled, said, "This is very trying to me; of all persons, I should have soft, clean hands. It is awful to offer diamonds or pearls, or jewels of any sort, to a possible customer when my hands are not perfectly white and tidy. It makes a repulsive background for the piece of jewelry." What kind of a background does your life and mine furnish for the pearl of greatest price?

What Is It to Be a Christian?

It has been said by Dr. Henry Van Dyke that "to be a Christian is not to invent a little system of self-denials, which are often foolish and may be altogether selfish; not to carve out a little cross for ourselves, and wear it as much for ornament as for sacrifice; but to cut loose from self altogether, as a ship must lift her anchor before she can move with the tides; to take up the burden that He appoints for us, sure that it cannot be unnecessary or useless, and to go after Him wherever he may lead us. We must follow him in thought, submitting our minds to his instruction and believing him implicitly. We must follow him in feeling, learning to sympathize with him in all desires and purposes which he revealed to us in his ministry of love. We must follow him in action, trying to live as we think he would live if he were on earth and in our place to-day."

The Christians at Antioch were like wind-wafted seeds. Many a volcanic or coral island in the sea has been covered with trees and shrubbery by wind-wafted seeds, and has had its barrenness changed into beauty and fruitfulness. The storms of persecution carried some of the Christians in Jerusalem to Antioch, three hundred miles away to the north. Antioch was magnificent in its fortifications, its immense public buildings and its beautiful statues. It has been said of Antioch that it was "foremost in refinement and culture, and foremost also in luxury and vice." We may well wonder why such a place should have been selected by Christian refugees. But we are told "that the hand of the Lord was with them." And they began to grow in their new environment by preaching the Gospel of Jesus Christ and teaching in his name; but they at first confined their efforts to the Jews whom they found there, and then some of their number began to preach to the Gentiles. And both Jews and Gentiles received the Lord Jesus as their Saviour. Those refugees have been called "the first missionaries of the Cross." The disciples who had been with Jesus had remained in Jerusalem, and constituted, with some who had not fled on account of persecution, what we might call the mother Church, of which James, the brother of our Lord, was the pastor, or so-called "bishop." Word reached the mother Church of the Gospel work being done in Antioch, and Barnabas, as the best beloved of their number, was sent there to investigate and direct the Christian movement. And we are told that when he had come he was glad, and as a result of his coming much people were added unto the Lord! A wonderful reinforcement was Barnabas at such a time as that, for we are told that he was "a good man, and full of the Holy Spirit and of faith."

The Successors of Barnabas

These have been many; some have gone to follow the Gospel work begun by others, and some have gone to do the planting.

An African woman once asked a sad question about missions. It ought to be asked in every missionary meeting. The question was this: "Why do not more come to tell us? Is it because they do not love us, or because they do not love Jesus very much?"

The Difference Between Being a Heathen and Being a Christian

A black-eyed baby lay moaning its young life away on the brick bed of a dreary mud house in Peking, China. The young mother gazed in despair upon her dying child. She longed to press it to her aching heart, but she had been taught that demons are all around the dying, waiting to snatch the soul away, and so because it was dying she was afraid of her own baby! "The cart will soon pass," said the mother-in-law, "and then we shall have to keep it in the house all night. There is no help for it; the gods are angry with you." And saying so, she snatched up the helpless babe. The mother shrieked, "My baby is not dead! My baby is not dead yet!" But the baby was carried from her sight, and she never saw it again. An old black cart, drawn by a black cow, soon came along, and the baby, not yet dead, was laid on the heap of dead ones. The carter drove on through the city gate, and cast his load into a pit, which he filled up with lime. The desolate mother wails, "My baby is lost! My baby is lost! I can never find him again!"

Turn your gaze upon another picture: a blue-eyed baby lay moaning on the down pillows of its dainty crib, in a missionary family in Peking. "Our baby is going home," said the mother; and, though her voice trembled, she smiled bravely and sweetly upon the little sufferer. "We gave her to the Lord when she came to us, and now he has but come for his own," said the father, reverently. As we watched through our tears the little life slipping away, some one began to sing:

Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to thy bosom fly.

The blue eyes opened for the last time, and with a loving look and gentle sigh the sweet child passed through the gate to the heavenly fold.

"Let us pray," said a low voice. We knelt together, and heaven came so near we could almost see the white-robed ones and hear their songs of welcome.

There are no baby coffins to be bought in Peking, so a box was made; we lined it with soft, white silk. We dressed baby in her snowy robes and laid her lovingly in her last resting place. We decked the room with flowers and strewed them over the little

CLEVER DOCTOR

Removed a 20 Years' Trouble Without Any Medicine

A wise Indian physician removed a 20 years' stomach disease without any medicine as his patient tells:

"I had stomach trouble for 20 years, tried family medicine, patent medicines and all the simple remedies suggested by my friends, but grew worse all the time.

"Finally a doctor who is the most prominent physician in this part of the state told me medicine would do me no good, only irritate my stomach and make it worse—that I must look to diet and quit drinking coffee.

"I cried out in alarm, 'Quit drinking Coffee!' why, 'What will I drink?'

"'Try Postum,' said the doctor, 'I drink it and you will like it when it is made according to directions, with cream, for it is delicious and has none of the bad effects coffee has.'

"Well that was two years ago and I am still drinking Postum. My stomach is right again and I know Doctor hit the nail on the head when he decided coffee was the cause of all my trouble. I only wish I had quit it years ago and drank Postum in its place."

Never too late to mend. Ten days' trial of Postum in place of coffee works wonders. "There's a reason."

one. The next day we followed the tiny coffin to the cemetery. Now a white stone marks the sacred spot where we laid her, and flowers blossom on the grave, which is visited often and tended with loving care. The sweet mother says, "Our baby is safe; we shall have her again some glad day."

The blue-eyed baby's mother is a Christian. (This story is told by Clara M. Cushman, in The Gospel in All Lands.)

James Chalmers, in addressing a large meeting in London, composed of the friends and supporters of missions, said: "I have had twenty-one years' experience among natives. I have seen the semi-civilized and the uncivilized; I have lived with the Christian native, and I have lived, dined and slept with the cannibal. I have visited the islands of the New Hebrides, I have visited the Loyalty group, I have seen the work of missions in the Samoan group. I know all the islands of the Society group, I have lived for ten years in the Harvey group, I know a few of the groups close on the line, and for at least nine years of my life I have lived with the savages of New Guinea; but I have never yet met with a single man or woman, or a single people, that your civilization without Christianity has civilized. Wherever there has been the slightest spark of civilized life in the Southern Seas it has been because the Gospel has been preached there, and wherever you find in the island of New Guinea a friendly people, or a people that will welcome you, there the missionaries of the cross have been preaching Christ."

As to Boy Christians

A boy who is going to make a noble Christian man out of himself must begin his Christian life while he is still a boy. Some one has said that in these days there must be "armor-plated boys," boys who are iron-clad on:

Their lips, against the first taste of liquor.

Their ears, against impure words.

Their hands, against wrongdoing.

Their feet, against going with bad company.

Their pockets, against dishonest money.

Their tongues, against evil speaking.

This Christian armor, thus worn by her citizens, gives more security to the nation than all the armor-plate on her ships.

In the family of the German Emperor are seven sons. Many interesting things concerning their boyhood have from time to time appeared in print, but nothing more so than a letter which the kingly father wrote to his sons, the Princes August Wilhelm and Oscar, on the day of their confirmation. From this we quote in part:

"MY DEAR SONS: At the present time, when we are about to express our congratulations that you have joined us in the congregation of the Lord, as men who have a fervid desire to work therein, I should like, as your father, to make a few remarks to you as to the attainment of this aim. This day, in a spiritual sense, is for you similar to the day on which the officer or the soldier takes the oath of loyalty to his colors. As Princes of the Royal House, you have the privilege of wearing a uniform from the tenth year of your age. To this I desire to compare your confirmation. You are selected as fighters for Christ. With the present day, so to speak, you come of age in your faith. The defense and weapons, as well as the armor, which you will have to use have been taught you and prepared for you by a skilled hand. Their use in all the situations of life is left to you from now on. . . . Now, when I look back on my personal experience, I can only assure you—and your experience will be the same—that the cardinal and main object of human life, and principally that of a life full of responsibility and activity, lies solely and alone in the position we take regarding our Lord and Saviour. . . . There is only one thing I can advise you with all my heart, regarding the life that lies before you: toil and work without intermission; this is the essential part of the Christian life. It was thus He lived before us. Glance at the Scriptures, and read the parables of our Saviour. The severest punishment is for the one who does nothing, who sits idle, or floats with the stream, and allows others to do the work, as in the parable of the talents. Whatsoever be your possessions, or your gifts, every one should try to do the best in his power and in his province to become a personality, to grow into his duties, to toil in them, and to further them in accordance with the example of our Saviour."

Early Christians Were Generous Givers

It is said of them that "every man according to his ability determined to send relief unto the brethren that dwelt in Judea." The occasion for this was the famine which existed there. These gifts were not sent separately, but put together and given to Barnabas and Saul to carry to the Christians in Judea (Saul had been working with Barnabas for at least a year, teaching and preaching both to Jews and Gentiles). Note it was not an assessment made upon the Christians in Antioch; but, learning of the distress among the Judean Christians, each one determined what he was able to give and gave accordingly, with gladness of heart.

For 25 Years, You've Known Kayser Silk Gloves

No need to tell you about them.

You know the Kayser patent tip—the tip that outwears the glove. You know the Kayser fabric—the pure silk that we weave ourselves to secure that remarkable wear.

You know the Kayser finish, the Kayser fit. Every glove goes through fifty operations to get it.

We don't need to advertise Kaysers. For every woman knows that they are all that's desirable.

But You May Not Know This:

During the long glove craze there sprang up numerous inferior makes.

We could not supply one-tenth the long gloves wanted. So you took what you could get.

The most worthless gloves sold at twice the Kayser price. Even stocking tops sewed on to short gloves sold faster than makers could make them.

You got ill-wearing, ill-fitting gloves. And you thought, perhaps, that silk gloves had deteriorated.

But the Kaysers were then—and they are to-day—just as good as they ever were, but there were not enough to go around at that time.

"The Kayser"

Patent Finger-Tipped Silk Gloves

A Guarantee in Every Pair

Now you can all get Kaysers—any shade or style, long or short. We've immensely increased our facilities.

You can get the perfect fit, the durable fabric, the patent tip—the kind you always wore.

Inferior makes still seek the trade that you gave them when the Kaysers were gone. But you can avoid them if you simply look for "Kaysers" on the hem.

Every Woman Wants a Kayser

The Kayser silk glove is the one article on which all ideas agree. Every woman wants it.

In 25 years we have acquired a skill which no one can duplicate. We have no real competition.

We make so many gloves, and sell them so low, that an equal glove at our price is impossible.

The Kaysers sell everywhere at just the same price as gloves less than half as good.

You pay nothing extra to get them. Simply be careful. Look for the name in the hem.

"Life's Battles"

SOME time, when all life's battles have been fought,
And we the last leaf in life's book have turned,
What though our way with grief and pain was fraught,
What though we missed the joys for which we yearned?
We'll find the chastening rod was for our good.
Yes, when we reach the better land of rest,
We'll know 'twas best, had we but understood;
God chastens most the ones he loves the best.

And if our hearts are breaking at the thought
Of voices stilled and friends who proved untrue,
Oh, think not that the Father counts as naught
These burning tears that oft our pathway strew!
And as the sun of springtime drives away
The clouds of winter, and the flowers bloom,
So shall life's joys departed some sweet day
Shine forth in radiant beauty from the gloom.

Let not our hearts be troubled; though we see
But darkly through the glass, we know not why,
Yet God knows best, and in the future we Shall find it is not all of death to die.
And we shall somehow know and understand
Why all these bitter sorrows and heartaches
Were for our good. Yes, in the better land
All will be right, for God makes no mistakes.

African Missions*

AN Italian, the Count de Launay, is responsible for the inclusion in the Berlin Act, Clause VI, of the following article: "Christian missionaries, scientists and explorers, with their followers, property and collections, shall be the objects of special protection by the Congo Free State."

"For this enlightened enactment," says H. W. Mack, F.R.G.S., in his book upon the Congo Free State, "the thanks of the world are due."

The Count de Launay, in his address proposing the above article, remarked that the missionaries lend valuable assistance in winning new countries over to the highest civilization.

The bravery required to undertake the cultivation of the African field has been greater, perhaps, than that needed in any other. The mysterious nature of the little-explored country; the loathsome diseases prevailing among the known African tribes; the prejudice in some Christian nations against black men; these and many other considerations combined to daunt the spirit of the aspiring missionaries to the Dark Continent. But the prevailing temper among the entire body of them was that of the valiant Alexander Mackay, who, to the committee that were sending him in 1876, spoke as follows: "It is not likely that, of eight Englishmen starting for Central Africa, all will be alive six months after their arrival. One of us, at least, will probably fall before that time; but when the news comes, do not be cast down. Only send some one else immediately to take the vacant place."

There was, indeed, need that many missionaries be sent to the Central African field. O'Neill and Smith, the two leaders of the expedition, were murdered; Dr. John Smith and Mr. James Robertson succumbed to a native fever; and two others were compelled to return to England. By the end of March, 1878, only Mackay and Wilson were left.

It is notable that King Mtesa, of Uganda, though at times friendly, was greatly perplexed, as many others of the intelligent heathen have been, by the differences between the Christian sects. He said: "Every white man has a different religion from his brother's."

Let us hope that the day is not far distant when the walls of sect that divide us shall all be destroyed, and we can meet together on the great common platform, "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and I will try to follow his example in all things."

The history of the Uganda mission —the work of Mackay, Hannington, Ashe, and other noble men, is a thrilling chapter of martyrdom, persecution, heroism and godly devotion.

Livingstone and Stanley are the best known among African travelers. Their stories are familiar to all, but they are never old. To Livingstone are due the chief thanks for the eradication of the slave trade, though Brougham, in the British House of Lords, had nobly prepared the way.

One of the great encouragements to all missionaries is the story of George Schmidt, the first missionary to South Africa. He worked six years, yet baptized but seven converts. His reward was to come when, fifty years later, missionaries succeeded him, who were received most cordially because of the memories of Schmidt's good deeds.

The whole history of the unfolding of Africa is marvelous; and the work yet to be done there is crying for helpers.

From forest depths and river strands,
Where scarce a stranger's foot hath trod,
Lo, Afric stretches out her hands,
And seeketh after God.

* Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, April 25. TEXT: Jer. 1:6-12.

Our Spiritual Birth*

THE unrest of the unconverted soul, and its bewilderment as it contemplates life's mysteries, form one of the saddest of spectacles. A Christian beholding and realizing it should be nerved to the strongest efforts to bring light into his friend's darkness and to furnish him with a key for threading the labyrinth in which we wander on this earth.

For the Christian theory explains and clears away the mist that obscures all mundane affairs, and no other religion so wisely and conclusively interprets them to the thoughtful mind.

The philosopher has testified that the human heart is born with a deep hunger for worship. It turns hither and thither, seeking for an object worthy of its adoration, and for a guide through the tangled mazes of life. It is because the religion of Jesus Christ furnishes that which precisely and fully meets these universal needs that it has won its way through the centuries—through seas of blood, by desperate battle, often parched and fainting; but appealing forever to the conscience and the mind of man, until upon its maxims and its philosophy of life rest the very governments of the nations.

Could a man who is not a worshiper of our God, and a doer of his precepts, ever climb to the highest office in these United States? It seems impossible. And thanks be to His name that we have a long line of noble Presidents who have honored him, and have gone often to his house to kneel before him with his people.

The keen mind of Nicodemus detected the exalted nature of this new religion. He marked the character of its Leader. All the contumely visited upon Jesus could not dissuade the young ruler from seeking him out. The qualities in our great Leader which have conquered the Christian world were discerned by this high-minded and astute Pharisee, to whom the hollow shell of his formal religion must have appeared in its true light.

But to him, as to thousands since his day, it seemed unworthy and incredible that in order to attain to this lofty character one must utterly change, until he would seem to have been born again. Did he ever undertake this hard duty and become a follower of Christ? We know that he attempted to defend him, by demanding that a trial be given Jesus, when he might present his side of his case; and that the young ruler brought a hundred-pound weight of myrrh and aloes to Christ's sepulchre. But John seems to have been the only disciple who knew of his existence and his deeds; and the apocryphal gospel pretending to embody the teachings of Nicodemus is of doubtful authenticity. So that we shall probably never know his full story until that hour when all the deeds of men shall be made manifest.

The new birth of man, from the mortal darkness into the great spiritual light, is well described by Paulsen, when he says of the entrance into the heart of the belief in God and Christ: "It makes plain the meaning of life, the meaning of all things in general."

In Drummond's great address upon "The Changed Life," he decries the use of merely external rules as the unaccustomed feet turn into the strait path. He bids the convert avoid "the self-sufficient method, the self-crucifixion method, the mimetic method, the diary method," and instead, to "reflect the character of Christ, and you will become like Christ."

My Friend, the Bedouin Sheik

was a clean rug on the earthen floor, and two divans, covered with bright tapestry, for seats. We took off our shoes at the edge of the tent, and all the family rose and stood till we were seated. This was a delicate compliment to the sheik and his strange guest. Everything in the guest chamber was neat and orderly, and the whole tent was much cleaner than the stone house of the ordinary villager.

The evening breeze blew through the tent, wafting in the perfumes of the spring. It was decidedly a good way to live, especially when all the land was covered with flowers. The mistress of the tent brought in dinner in a brass tray, three feet wide, and set it on a stool a foot high. A copper platter, lined with some white metal, was in the middle of the tray and held the fish. Around it, in smaller metal dishes, were goat cheese, some green herbs, wild onions, a dish made of tender grape leaves, between which were layers of rice; there were also ripe olives, raisins and leban, or a kind of sour milk. There were no knives, forks or spoons on the table. My friend and his nephew sat down on the rug, and I followed their example. The woman of the tent did not come to the table.

After dinner the sheik and his nephew talked and smoked. Darkness comes suddenly in that country, and these people retire early. Shortly after the candles in the long brass holders were lighted, the woman appeared, bearing two great rolls in her arms, which were blankets and thin mattresses for myself and friend. They were unrolled on the floor rug, and there the sheik slept soundly, while I lay awake most of the night. My bed was so close to the edge of the tent that I could look into the great bending heaven and see the stars.

The tent was astir very early next morning. We arose and performed our ablutions in a small basin, set on a stone near the tent. When we returned the bed had been carried out, and a tray set on the low stool, this time laden with goat's flesh, raisins and bread. The little brass coffee pot, surmounted by the crescent, and with a quaint, horizontal handle, filled the tent with an aroma that was certainly inviting. That was the best coffee I ever drank. Before we finished breakfast, a lad led two splendid Arab horses up to the tent, and the sheik informed me by signs that we would ride to his village.

It was a splendid ride. The tough little Arab horse I rode was certainly a treasure. Soon we reached the sheik's village of thirty tents. His was the largest, and I learned that he was head sheik, or chief. He introduced me to his wife, a pleasant-faced woman, whose hair in two great shiny braids hung down in front. She wore a blue serge gown, embroidered with red, the points of the great flowing sleeves touching the ground. There was a red and brown checkered turban wound about her head, beneath which showed a veil, but she did not cover her face as she greeted me.

The sheik sent to a neighboring village for a young man who could speak English, to interpret for us. I learned much about the Bedouins from my friend. I was introduced to the heads of families, I regret to say, as "the man who lied to the fishes with feathers." And they assembled at the tent door to hear about the strange country and people over beyond the sunset.

The Bedouins have no united history; but simply collections of genealogies. My friend's only book was his family record, which went back several hundred years and recorded the family's wanderings. It reminded me of the Genesis of the Bible. The ability to unite seems to be lacking in the Bedouins, and seldom in the history of the past have the villages and tribes appeared as a united people. They are now found scattered from Persia to the Atlantic, and from Hindustan to the negro countries of Soudan. They are hospitable, independent, and love liberty; but have an infamous love of plunder, and violent passions. My sheik was one of their wisest men, and something of a statesman. He said that now since the railroad had been built from Haifa to Damascus the Germans kept the country in order along the line, and he knew it would be impossible to plunder the fellahin villages, as was the custom a generation ago; but it was with great difficulty that he restrained the people of his and other villages from going on such expeditions.

In religion these people professed to be Mohammedans; but they know as little of that religion as of Christianity. They believe in one God, and are so bitterly opposed to idolatry that they would not have pictures in their tents, believing them to be a kind of idol.

I found the sheik an expert sportsman, who loved horses and was an excellent judge of them. He explained that he was encouraging agriculture. The greatest difficulty was to overcome the old tradition that field work was disgraceful. I will never forget the benign expression on his dusky face as he called the shy little children out of their tents, and, with nearly a hundred about him, lifted his arms in a sort of patriarchal blessing and said, "Allah be praised that food is plentiful, and the lambs of our flock are well." He showed me the flocks of sheep, goats, camels and horses. Then he escorted me to Semakh, and waved me good-by, as I took boat on blue Galilee for Tiberias.

Finland's Sympathy

A LONG delayed letter from Finland, which for some unaccountable reason had been nearly three years before reaching its destination, was delivered at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices in New York a few days ago. It proved to be from Rev. Johannes Wayrynen, a prominent citizen of Kajana, who was one of the most energetic aids in the relief work conducted in that country by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in 1905-06. Hearing of the famine in Japan, and having on hand a small unexpended balance of relief funds from the Finnish famine, he decided to send it to this journal to help the sufferers in the Far East. This is his letter:

KAJANA, FINLAND, March 5, 1906.

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: From the newspapers I see that you are again undertaking a great relief work, this time for the famine sufferers in Japan. This is a reminder to us to send back what is left of the money contributed by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers for the famine sufferers in this district of Finland. I regret that there is but a little left of it. Every spring since 1903 has been a hard one for our poor, and we have given relief in those cases where we thought you yourself would have given it.

A fortnight past, for instance, there was a fire in a little cottage near this town. The father and mother were not at home at the time, but there were five children in the house, the eldest ten years old, the youngest ten months. They had no shoes, and in running from the fire to summon a neighbor at some distance the icy snow hurt their feet, leaving a trail of bloody steps. Their cow and five fowls were burned, with all the utensils. We helped the father to repair his house, and assistance was given by the neighbors, who provided the lumber. This left a balance of relief funds in hand of 350 marks, which I send to you.

Thousands of families in this district are blessing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and you whenever they see your picture. God bless you and the American nation for the good work done in the service of the unhappy in this world! You are teaching us and others the real Christian social democracy, after the mind of Jesus Christ. Would God that all were of the same kind; we would then have peace on the earth and happiness in the heart.

Very truly yours,
JOHANNES WAYRYNEN.

A Peace Court for Central America

Guatemala, the capital, is the largest city in Central America and has 80,000 inhabitants. The city is in the highlands, at an elevation of nearly 5,000 feet. It has broad streets and many parks and a great variety of architecture. Formerly an annual festival was held, called the Festival of Minerva, and a Greek temple was erected for the celebration. The city has in one of the plazas a statue of Columbus, which is notable among the many statues of Columbus that are to be found in all the Latin-American countries.

Columbus Statue, Guatemala City

The storm centre of affairs in Guatemala is President Cabrera. He has done some good things for the country and has tried to introduce American educational methods and manual training schools. Several years ago he invited a number of American teachers to take charge of these schools. President Cabrera is also charged with doing many evil things and with oppressing his countrymen, causing many of them to be executed and others to be sent into exile. It is undeniable, however, that at least two attempts have been made to assassinate him and that these have not been the efforts of individuals, but of political groups. President Cabrera is to be credited with completing the inter-oceanic railway line from the Atlantic to the Pacific after numerous companies had failed. By the completion of this line it is now easy to reach the capital from the United States. The steamers from New Orleans to Port Barrios take about three days for the voyage, and then a day's railway travel brings one to the capital. There is a large American colony in Guatemala. Its members are divided in their opinions of President Cabrera. Some of them, while condemning his political methods, praise him for what he has done in railway building and in developing agriculture and encouraging commerce.

THE GOSPEL IN ANTIOCH

By Mrs. M. Baxter

GOD had wider thoughts of salvation than for the Jewish race alone. Man's heart is very narrow, even when he is converted; and he wants to bring God into his narrowness, and to cause the Holy Ghost to work in his groove. Thus sects and parties believe in a work of God among themselves, but are apt to doubt it among other Christians, and to think something must be wrong with others because they follow not with them. Before our Lord's crucifixion, we find disciples absolutely forbidding a man to cast out devils because he followed not with them. And even after they were filled with the Holy Ghost, there was need for them to learn on this self-same point.

At the time of the persecution about Stephen, the disciples were "all scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judea and Samaria, except the apostles." Now, we read, "They which were scattered abroad upon the persecution that arose about Stephen traveled as far as Phenice, and Cyprus, and Antioch, preaching the Word to none but unto the Jews only. And some of them were men of Cyprus and Cyrene, which, when they were come to Antioch, spake unto the Grecians, preaching the Lord Jesus." Very probably they, not having been brought up in Jerusalem, were not half so high-church as were the residents in Jerusalem. It seems strange that Peter, a Galilean by birth, should have become so stiff a Jew; perhaps the priests who had recently become converted had had some influence upon him. When these Cyprian and Cyrenian Jews preached to the Greeks, "the hand of the Lord was with them: and a great number believed, and turned unto the Lord."

This is the history of every awakening which is brought about by God. First, the hand of the Lord is with the instruments; be they ordained and recognized ministers, or be they the simplest workers for God, the hand of the Lord with them is the power by which they work; and when it is so, a great number do believe and turn to the Lord. But there was nothing like a national turning, such as will be when the Jews, repentant and restored, shall be the world's evangelists, and a nation shall be born in a day.

The church at Jerusalem heard of this blessed work of God, and "they sent forth Barnabas, that he should go as far as Antioch." It was God's ordering that this loving, gentle man should be the messenger. He was glad; his religion was full of "the joy of the Lord," and this blessed work of God's spirit brought new life to him. He held some meetings among them, for we read, "he exhorted them all, that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord." Without doubt, the tone of the work was much deepened through this visit of Barnabas; the converts could look up to him, he was like a father among them. From that time the infant church at Antioch received a great impetus forward. Not only the church at Antioch was benefited, but the entire world where the Gospel has been preached.

Two Full Gallons Free to Try You Pay No Freight to Try My Paint

O. L. Chase St. Louis, Mo.

I HAVE a new way of manufacturing and selling house paint that's unique—that's better. Before my plan, Paint was sold in two ways—either ready-made—or mixed by a local painter. Both these ways are at fault.

Ready-made Paint settles hard in cans—and mineral pigments and chemical acting driers in ready-made paint eat the life out of Linseed Oil—which is the LIFE of all paint. Painter-Made Paint can never be properly made by a painter—because of lack of heavy mixing and grinding machinery. My Paint is ready to use—but not ready-made. My Paint is made to order—after the order is received—packed in hermetically sealed cans—(extra size to insure a full gallon) and dated the day the Paint is made.

Pure Linseed Oil and pure, fresh paint ingredients are used in my Paint. Such materials found at local stores, are usually adulterated.

I sell my Paint direct from factory to user—at very low factory prices.

I pay freight on six-gallon orders or over.

When the order of six gallons or over is received, use two full gallons to test it—and if you are not perfectly satisfied, in every particular, return the balance of the order to me—and the two gallons you have used shan't cost you a penny.

No other paintmaker offers such a liberal proposition. I make three brands of Paint to suit the requirements of my immense trade.

My strictly Pure All White Lead Paint is absolutely the best paint in the world. My 40-60 Brand Zinc and Lead Paint is the best paint in its class on the market. My Durahility Paint has an immense sale everywhere, and is sold under five-year iron-clad guarantee. The Purity of my Paint is guaranteed under a forfeit of $100.00 in gold. O. L. CHASE, THE PAINTMAN, Dept. 8, ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI

A Young Northwestern Explorer

HARRY V. RADFORD is a young man of New York City, for whom the lure of the North has proved too strong, and he has left recently to explore an unknown part of the Dominion of Canada. Mr. Radford is only twenty-eight, and looks even younger. He went first to Ottawa, where he had an interview with Earl Grey, the Governor General of the Dominion, who promised him every government facility possible to make his journey a success. He is now on his way to Edmonton, where the real hardships of his journey will begin. He will take guides from the various wild tribes along his route, and the trip will be made on foot. He will use snowshoes for the greater part of the way across Mackenzie Province. He will attempt to mark a new route through to the Arctic Ocean. He will make maps of the upper part of the province and collect specimens of the fauna and flora for American institutions.

Harry V. Radford

Mr. Radford, aside from the supplies obtained from hunting and fishing, will live, for the most part, on scientifically prepared and condensed foods. He has taken a large supply of chocolate, which is supposed to contain the greatest amount of nourishment for its bulk. His trip calls to mind the fact that there are still large tracts of the earth's surface as yet but little known to civilized man, though explorers are searching everywhere to add new geographical facts.

ASTRONOMICAL QUERIES

Answered by Professor Leland, Sea Breeze, Florida

W. D. R., Plankinton, S. Dak. 1. In what month in the year 1910 is Halley's comet due to appear? 2. The last total eclipse of the sun visible in the United States occurred August 7, 1869. Can you inform me when the next total eclipse visible in this country will take place?

1. The comet will be visible most of the summer. 2. The next total eclipse of the sun crossing the United States will be on January 24, 1925. Its shadow will cross from ocean to ocean.

J. R. M., Archer, Fla. The space in our solar system is filled with nebulous matter. This is composed of particles in size from the finest microscopic dust grains to masses of a considerable size. These are formed into clouds which follow each other in streams of magnificent magnitude. They move through space in an irregular way, but with a general direction towards or from the sun. Our earth, as well as other planets, often passes through those cloud-streams, and when doing so millions of these particles come into our atmosphere. Here their motion is arrested and is converted into light and heat, and the masses, greater or lesser size, become visible to us. The resistance of our atmosphere causes the motion of the masses to be decreased, and the attraction of the earth pulls them down. The action upon our atmosphere is so great as to use the particles or masses to be consumed before reaching the earth. These are called "shooting stars" when they stream obliquely along the sky, and "falling stars" when they come more directly towards the earth. Our earth usually passes through zones of these meteoric clouds in August and November each year. The phenomenon may occur, however, at any time. There is nothing mysterious about it. Not infrequently these shooting or falling stars may be visible to every country on the earth within twenty-four consecutive hours. The display of 1833 was far surpassed in magnitude by that of 1873.

E. S. W., Aurora, Ind. Was the meteoric shower of November, 1833, the most wonderful of modern times?

It was not an exceptional one. The shower of 1873 was not so local and made a display more awe-inspiring. All meteoric showers are local. These showers are frequent on the earth, but rarely extending over any great territory.

L. A. R., Columbia, S. C. What is the morning star now? Also, the evening star? When does the change occur to another star?

Venus is now (March 22) our morning star and Jupiter is our evening star. About May 1 Venus will become our evening star, and Mars will be the morning star until about October 1, when Mars will join Venus as evening star. On April 3 Saturn will be a companion of Venus as morning star until January, 1910. And on October 1 Mars will join Jupiter in his evening splendor. The other planets will also be visible during this year.

NEW INVENTION! BURNS AIR

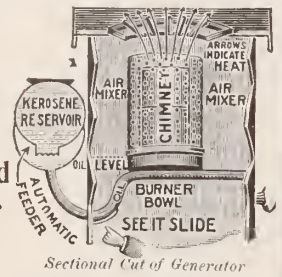
NOTHING ELSE LIKE IT—THE MOST WONDERFUL STOVE EVER INVENTED

Consumes 395 Barrels of Air to One Gallon Common Kerosene Oil

Causing Great Excitement Wherever Exhibited

Fuel drawn principally from atmosphere. Uses 395 barrels of air while consuming one gallon of oil. Wood and coal cost money. ONLY FREE FUEL IS AIR. Supply unlimited. No trust in control. Air belongs to rich and poor alike.

Harrison's Valveless Wickless Automatic Oil-Gas and Air-Burner Stove



Sectional Cut of Generator

Antomatically generates gas from kerosene oil, mixing it with air. Burns like gas. Intense hot fire. Combustion perfect. To operate—turn knob—oil runs into burner—touch a match! It generates gas, which passes through air mixer, drawing in about a barrel of air to every large spoonful of oil consumed. That's all. It is self-regulating—no more attention. Same heat all day or all night. For more or less heat, simply turn knob. There it remains until you come again. To put fire out, turn knob, raising burner—oil runs back into can—fire's out. As near perfection as anything in this world. Ideal for Summer Use. No dirt, soot or ashes. No leaks—nothing to clog or close up. No wick—not even a valve—yet heat is under proper control.

D. CARN, Ind., writes: "It costs me only 4½ cents a day for fuel."

L. NORRIS, Vt., writes: "The Harrison Oil-Gas Generators are wonderful savers of fuel—at least 50 to 75 per cent. over wood and coal."

E. ARNOLD, Neb., writes: "Saved $1.25 a month for fuel by using the Harrison Oil-Gas Stove. My range cost me $5.50 per month and the Harrison $1.25 per month. Objectionable features of all other stoves wiped out."

One, two or three-burner sizes—with or without oven.

NOT LIKE THOSE SOLD IN STORES

Ideal for cooking, roasting, baking, ironing, canning fruit, picnics, cottages, camping; also for heating houses, stores, rooms, etc., with radiating attachment. No more carrying coal, kindling, ashes, soot and dirt. No hot, fiery kitchens. Absolutely safe from explosion. Not dangerous like gasoline. Simple, durable—last for years. Saves expense, drudgery and fuel bills.

ALL SIZES. PRICES LOW—$3.25 and up. Sent to any address. Send no money—only send your name and address. Write to-day for our 30-day trial offer—full description—thousands of testimonials. 1909 Proposition. Circulars FREE.

The Little Doctor

A Serial Story Written for "The Christian Herald"

By AGNES LOWE ELLIS

CHAPTER XXIII

THE absence of Dr. Verner was painfully felt by the whole party when they arrived at New York. After George had made arrangements for their comfort at the hotel, he hurried off, to find, if possible, some further explanation of his friend's sudden departure.

He had sailed in the morning, but, as George had hoped, had left a letter for him in care of his devoted landlady, who seemed to think that he would give her some reason for the unlooked-for departure of the young doctor.

"I don't see what his poor people will ever do without him," she said mournfully.

George would not open the letter with those anxious, questioning eyes gazing at him, so, saying that he knew important business and nothing else could have made Dr. Verner forsake his beloved work, and that he was sure he would return as soon as possible, he left the office, sought the privacy of his own room, hurriedly opened his letter and read:

"My Dear George:

"Strange things happen in this world! Again have I proved the truth of the words of Holy Writ, 'Cast thy bread upon the waters and thou shalt find it after many days.'

"My kindness to my poor Spanish patient has yielded an abundant return; and the possibility of what this world may hold for me, of longed-for and, until the present, seemingly unattainable happiness, makes it possible for me to forgive a great wrong done to me and mine.

"No wonder that that polished society man, Strahan, quailed with fear at the sight of me, the night when he became, as he explained, so 'suddenly overcome by the heat.' His conscience was not entirely dead. He found that the poor woman whom he, years ago, made an unwitting partner in his crime, was my patient. Accordingly, he left a letter for me with her, and then speedily left for parts unknown.

"My poor parents were foully wronged through him, and, believing that I have a clue to a living relative, whose identity I can establish through this letter, I leave to-morrow to begin my search.

"I am too much excited to write a coherent letter, but knowing you will wish me godspeed, I explain this much to you. I shall write you soon after my arrival in Edinburgh, which is the goal of my hopes.

"With truest regard and affection,

"Dudley."

Upon his return to the hotel in the evening, George found his mother rested and refreshed, while Aunt Phœbe was entertaining the company with the news that the Squire and Marian would sail in April for home.

As Aunt Phœbe expressed a wish to retire, the family were left alone, and Mrs. Hunter urged Lily to read the letter which she was so anxious to hear.

"Sac A-Kal, March 19, ——.

"My Dear Friends:

"Once more, before leaving this sunny land of Mexico, I send you a letter. Yes, it is a land of sun, for to-day, as we sat together in the quaint old sitting-room, the thermometer registered ninety-four degrees, as it hung to the entrance door. Think of such heat in March, as compared with the snow and wind and ice of the March weather at home!

"The country is a marvel of wonder. Indeed, it sometimes seems to me to be a new world to which I have come, and, besides all this, I feel a great joy as I wander about this strange land, for I have trodden the same paths, wandered through the same rooms, and sat under the shade of the same tropical trees, that once knew the presence of my own dear mother. Here, for months after her marriage, she lived in a fairy-land of wonder and delight, surrounded by an atmosphere of love. The present owner of the place has been more than kind in assisting my father to settle some perplexing business matters, and, can you believe me, this plantation, this old historic 'Sac A-Kal,' is mine by legal right! It is almost too wonderful to be true. It seems to hurt my father in some way to speak of it; but he tells me that very soon he will explain many things about my mother and my own early days, which until now he did not care to confide to me.

"A beautifully inlaid table in the room that was once my mother's, was found to contain, in a curiously hidden secret drawer, a number of old letters and papers and some small portraits, all very precious to us. I have not seen all the portraits. My father looked over them alone, and I did not intrude upon his evident grief; but he has given me a small picture of my mother—a sweet, beautiful face, even more lovely than our picture at home; and we are to take the table home with us. It is of exquisite workmanship and has quite a history.

"The legal matters necessary in order to give me my rights will be rather annoying to the present occupant of the place, as well as to my father; but I am told to enjoy all that I can of this strange land, as I have nothing to do with business matters.

"We leave here in a few days for the village. Then we proceed to Campeche, where, after a short stay, we sail for New York.

"My father is to sail for Europe soon after our arrival home, but he thinks I had better not accompany him this time. I shall be very sorry if he must go alone, although, being such a good traveler, one need not fear for him.

"This sojourn in a strange land, with all the circumstances attending it, makes me feel as if I had been dreaming. The near prospect of reunion with you, dear friends, gladdens my heart. With love and best wishes from us both, Your friend,

"Marian."

Not until a late hour were the family ready to retire. After the reading of the letter, there was much to talk about—especially the strange circumstances attending the visit to the plantation, and the revelations concerning Marian's mother. Mrs. Hunter seemed less surprised and startled than the others, and looked as though it was not all new to her.

George, alone, was restless and anxious and not in a mood for retiring. He decided at last to take a brisk walk, and was soon in the neighborhood of his friend Dudley's office.

Just as he reached the door, a physician whom he knew as a friend of Dudley's came out, and grasping his hand, said, "How fortunate this is! Come along with me and I will explain as I go. I came over here," he continued, "for some medicine which I needed for one of the doctor's poor patients. I fear she is dying, and as I cannot speak the Spanish language, it is hard to know just what she wants to tell me; but there seems to be something on her mind connected with Dr. Verner. Perhaps between us we can make it out."

SICK DOCTOR

Proper Food Put Him Right.

The food experience of a physician in his own case when worn and weak from sickness and when needing nourishment the worst way is valuable:

"An attace of grip, so severe it came near making an end of me, left my stomach in such condition I could not retain any ordinary food. I knew of course that I must have food nourishment or I could never recover.

"I began to take four teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts and cream three times a day and for 2 weeks this was almost my only food; it tasted so delicious that I enjoyed it immensely and my stomach handled it perfectly from the first mouthful. It was so nourishing I was quickly built back to normal health and strength.

"Grape-Nuts is of great value as food to sustain life in serious attacks in which the stomach is so deranged it cannot digest and assimilate other foods.

"I am convinced that were Grape-Nuts more widely used by physicians, it would save many lives that are otherwise lost from lack of nourishment."

Absolutely the most perfect food in the world. Trial of Grape-Nuts 10 days proves. "There's a Reason."

THE LITTLE DOCTOR

They hastened along through the almost deserted streets, and found upon their entrance that the poor woman was sinking fast. Her face brightened as she saw George, who had many times sent her fruit and flowers.

She placed a small parcel in his hand. It was addressed to Dudley, and when George said, "I will give it to him," she smiled and pointed upward, with a rapt look upon her face. Then, with a sigh of content, she leaned her head upon the shoulder of the kind woman who cared for her.

Dudley had spoken of her as one of "God's little ones," and it was not possible to look upon her peaceful, happy face, without feeling that all was well with her.

Both men took their departure after a kindly farewell, and when George went to inquire the next morning, he was not surprised to be told that her life's weary journey was ended.

For Dudley's sake, he saw that all necessary preparations were made for the quiet funeral; then, after all was over, he ordered the house closed until the doctor's return.

CHAPTER XXIV

DUDLEY reached Glasgow after a stormy passage and proceeded to Edinburgh, whence he telegraphed the following message to George:

"Arrived safely. My hopes are realized. DUDLEY."

George rejoiced with him, although not fully aware of the cause. It was enough to know that his friend had found a great happiness, of which in time he would receive a full explanation.

Dudley's ocean voyage was thoroughly enjoyed in spite of the impatience with which he counted the days until the steamer could land him on the shores of the country where his present hopes and anxieties all centred.

Two days before they reached Glasgow, he became acquainted with a young man, who, from his delicate appearance, won his sympathy. Dudley found, on taking a seat beside this youth one day, that he was on his way home from America to seek health and strength amid the highland hills of Scotland, his native land. To the eye of the young physician, the hectic cheek and the hacking cough of this young invalid foretold the worst. His sympathy and loving care won the sick boy's warmest gratitude; and when they arrived at Glasgow he was easily persuaded to accompany Dudley to Edinburgh, where they were met by the young man's father, Mr. MacDonald.

It went to Dudley's heart to see the shocked look of surprise on the face of the fond parent, and he readily yielded to the importunity of the young invalid, as his father, with true Highland hospitality, urged him to accompany them to a hotel, where they meant to rest for a day, and, if necessary, several days, before attempting the journey home. As a physician, Dudley advised Mr. MacDonald not to remove his son for a number of days, as he needed rest and quiet.

Taking his much prized letter, he started out one day, and after a brisk walk found himself on Princes Street, where he boarded a street car for Morningside, to visit the asylum there.

The patient whom he sought had recovered so far as to be able to leave the asylum and had taken up his abode with friends on Forest Road, Edinburgh, whither he turned his footsteps.

Fortunately, he found the owner of the house, Mr. Douglas, at home. Upon receiving Dudley's card he came at once to the drawing-room, and said, "You wish to see me, Dr. Verner—I am Mr. Douglas."

Dudley replied, "Yes, Mr. Douglas, I came to see Mr. Joseph Ferrer, whom I understand to be at present a guest of yours. I have just returned from Morningside, where I expected to find him; but I was told there that he had so far recovered his health as to be able to leave the asylum, and that he was to be found here."

"Yes, he is here, fairly well now, although still feeble, and needing to have the utmost caution used in regard to being subjected to annoyance or excitement. May I ask if your message to him is urgent?"

Thereupon Dudley, who was drawn to the stranger by an irresistible impulse, and felt that he was one to be trusted, told him his errand, and even showed him the letter, not without a degree of excitement which led his hearer during the narration to seize his hand in a kindly grasp. As he listened, with tears in his eyes, he exclaimed, "Thank God!"

As soon as he had recovered from the surprise which the news caused, he said, "And so my friend Joseph has a son! He fancied that he had a daughter living somewhere. Indeed, he has always insisted upon this, but we thought it was all a dream. Now his child proves to be a son, and one any father may well be proud of. Nay, do not think that I flatter you. This is too serious a time for such a thing. But my heart is full of thankfulness, and I rejoice for my dear friend's sake. I see a good deal of resemblance to him in your face, and a look of your mother, too. I knew her, but only for a short time.

"How I wish the villains who kidnapped you, and the cousin who employed them, had their deserts! I see it all now. Poor Joseph, who was declared insane, and kept in close confinement until he almost became so, was not the only heir to the immense wealth. You must be gotten rid of, too. What a mercy they did not do away with you altogether! The poor woman who acted as nurse had no idea of their plans, or any wrongdealing, when she lent herself to the scheme. You see he savs in this letter that he and Joseph's cousin told her that both your parents were dead, when at that time the truth was that both were living. Then they told the poor mother that you had died. How wonderful are the ways of Providence!" To be concluded

"She Hath Done What She Could"

"SHE hath done what she could," the Saviour said;
But Judas, standing near her, criticized;
And His disciples, seeing, looked surprised
When Mary poured upon the Saviour's head
A box of rarest ointment, highly prized.

"The poor have need of much," I hear one say;
"She could have fed a hundred if she would;
I'm sure she has not done the thing she should."
But Jesus said, as he waved them away,
"Let her alone, she hath done what she could."

No silver tongue of angel or of man,
No gilded phrases ever coined on earth,
E'er paid a tribute of such matchless worth,
Or one that glowed with greater beauty than
The one that Mary's act of love gave birth.

The world will place her trophies at the feet
Of those that win great riches or great fame;
But those who in the battle's fire and flame
Do all they can, but failing, meet defeat,
Are buried low and leave a fameless name.

Upon the hook of Heav'n, sometimes I think
Above the names of many great and good,
Above the names of many prophets stood
An honor roll that's kept in golden ink:
The names of those that did the best they could.

Though good and bad alike may criticize,
Yet ever speaks the Man of Galilee,
"Let them alone who sacrifice for me."
So may the record say, beyond the skies,
"They have done what they could" of me and thee.

Questions and Answers

K. McI., Calabojie, Ontario, Canada. Will you kindly explain what is meant by the department called the Cradle Roll, in connection with some of your large Sunday Schools in the States and in England?

In some churches it is customary, where mothers of children are members of the Sunday School, to have their babies placed upon the roll of the school, even though too young to attend. This roll is called the Cradle Roll. As soon as they are old enough to come, they are placed in the infant class.

W. G., Harriman, Tenn. 1. Were the apostles called Christians? 2. Who first called the disciples Christians at Antioch? 3. Was the Church at Antioch a Gentile church?

1. No. 2. The believers in Christ who were dispersed from Jerusalem at the death of Stephen came to Antioch. That city soon became a central point for the diffusion of Christianity, and here, according to all accounts, the word "Christians" was first applied to professors of the new faith. 3. The church founded there by Paul was probably a Gentile church.

A. B., Turtle Creek, Pa. What are the duties of trustees in a church, legal or otherwise?

Mr. G. H. Crawford, our lawyer, gives the following answer to your query: Church trustees must take good care of the church property; receive collections and other moneys contributed; pay the minister, organist, janitor, insurance, repair bills, interest on mortgages, etc. They should appoint a treasurer, and he ought to be required to give a bond, but this is seldom done. Such trustees have general power over the services, though this is usually left to the minister, and they are responsible to see that the doctrines of the sect to which the church belongs are substantially adhered to.

A. M. N., Grove City, Pa. How were the laborers mentioned in II. Chron. 2:17, 18, paid? Or was the temple built with voluntary labor?

The labor of war captives, or slaves, of whom there were many, was doubtless unpaid, and there may have been much voluntary labor besides. The cost of the temple was defrayed by royal bounty, David having saved up an immense treasure for this object. There is no evidence, however, that the services rendered by the skilled workers and by Hiram's men were unrewarded.

E. R. M., Pittsburg, Pa. Is it possible, under present methods, to embalm a body in mid-ocean, so that burial may be made on land instead of at sea, as is the custom?

Yes; just as well as on land. The only reason bodies are buried at sea is that the steamship companies do not want to take the trouble of embalming and carrying out regulations of the boards of health on arrival. Several recent cases of people being buried at sea, despite the protests of their relatives, have brought the matter up and it is hoped that a change will soon be made in the custom, though it will take time and the passage of laws to effect it.

Mrs. M. L. B. B. Please send me some ideas on systematic giving for a monthly missionary meeting.

Show the people that they will usually give more, and feel it less, by giving in that way than in any other; that only by regular donations can the societies know what to depend upon; that the wisest nation that ever existed, the Jewish, early discerned the necessity of systematic giving for religion and charity, and fixed the proportion at one-tenth of a man's income. Find works on systematic giving. Nearly every minister has written sermons upon it.

1. A firkin is a measure for liquids, equivalent to nearly nine gallons. 2. The expression meant no disrespect, but was merely the usual form of the language of that day. It implied that he could do nothing because she, or any one else, requested him, but must await "his hour," i. e., the expression of his Father's will, which would be his signal for action.

M. B. D., Shamokin, Pa., writes: "Your recent article on the determined efforts of the saloon traffic to invade the Lord's Day reminds me of similar attempts made in past years, all of which failed, however, being defeated by the good sense of the law-abiding, order-loving, God-fearing element in the community. We are really advancing on the line of national temperance. What a difference now from the time when, a little over three hundred years ago, Margrave Frederick V. founded the first temperance society! And such a society! 'The noble members,' says one writer, 'were bound by a pledge, valid for two years, not to drink more than seven bumpers of wine with any meal, nor more than fourteen bumpers a day. They were, however, permitted to quench any surplus of thirst with beer, and to drink one glass of whisky besides. By this ideal of

M. H. R., Elkwood, N. D. Give some information about General Wolfe, who was killed at Quebec.

James Wolfe was born in 1727, at Wisterham, Kent, England. He became a lieutenant in 1741, and in 1743 fought at Dettengen, and two years later fought against the Scotch Highlanders at Falkirk and Culloden. In 1758 he commanded a brigade at the taking of Louisburg, and was selected by Pitt to take Quebec. He besieged the city for two months, with 9,000 men. On the 10th of September, 1754, he climbed the cliffs above the city, met the French on the Plains of Abraham, and was killed at the moment of victory. See Parkman's Montcalm and Wolfe.

S. F. H., Ambler, Pa. Was Abraham Lincoln a religious man?

Most decidedly. "A man of prayer."

N. W., Kensington, Ga. Please tell me the length, width and depth of the Panama Canal, and in what way will our people be profited by it when completed.

The Panama Canal is about fifty miles long. The canal will have a minimum depth of forty-one feet. The bottom width will be from two hundred feet in the Culebra cut to an indefinite width in the lakes. The canal will enable ships passing from Atlantic to Pacific ports to make the journey in two or three weeks. To go around the Horn would be a matter of several months. It will enable our fleets to pass from ocean to ocean with great saving of time, money, etc. Commercially, its importance cannot be overestimated; some of the Southern ports will become of great importance.

1. Your case is a hard one. If gentleness and kindness have no effect, can you not appeal to his sense of justice? Generally such a man is influenced most through his affection or through his fears. If you could show him that he would lose the respect of others if his course were known, would it not move him? The law simply exacts "reasonable support" for wife and children from the husband and father. If boisterous and disorderly, he can be bound over to keep the peace, but he cannot be punished for ordinary slanderous talk. 2. The poem is "The Bridge," and is to be found in any edition of Longfellow's works. 3. President Taft is a Protestant.

Miscellaneous

M. J. E., Borgettstown, Pa. We do not know the original of the character to whom you refer.

Reader, Pontiac, Ill. You can obtain the hymn from Biglow & Main Co., 156 Fifth Avenue, New York. Do not know the hook you inquired for.

A. A. C., New York City. We are unable to answer your three questions. Perhaps some large history of New York City, in the Astor Library, might give you the information.

WHERE MR. ROOSEVELT MAY HUNT

WHERE will Mr. Roosevelt go during the twelve months or longer which he proposes to spend in Africa? Probably every American old enough to read, and multitudes elsewhere, are asking the question—a question which Mr. Roosevelt himself cannot answer. For it is certain that the ex-President will be guided in his journeyings by conditions as they arise from day to day, and that there will be no settled programme to be followed throughout the course of the expedition. Mr. Roosevelt will not be starting for a definite destination when he leaves Mombasa for the interior.

It is understood that he will for a time be the guest of Mr. William McMillan, at or near a place called Nairobi, in British East Africa. Mr. McMillan's place is called Juja Farm. The neighborhood abounds in animal life, including gazelles, zebras, rhinoceros, and the homestead is enclosed with a high iron fence, or palisade, as a defense against lions or thieving natives. The McMillan stables are well stocked, and there is ample protection for the animals against mosquitoes and flies, which in the wet season mean death to horses. There are a pumping station and an electric plant, an excellent dairy and a great garden, with European and African fruits and vegetables. There are some ten white men and over 700 Somalis and other natives constantly employed at Mr. McMillan's caring for the vast herds of oxen, the ponies and mules, the farm, the power plant, etc. Although Juja Farm—which is really an extensive ranch—is "in the jungle," it is marked by so many of the accompaniments of comfort and civilization that one might well forget at times that it is within the greatest big game hunting territory the world has ever known.

It is known, however, that Mr. Roosevelt will make his start from Mombasa, the principal seaport of British East Africa, from which a railway runs to Port Florence, on the Victoria Nyanza. It is expected that Mr. Roosevelt and his party will take the railway for a certain distance, and then strike off toward the north to hunt the larger animals of which he is in search. As to what our former President may encounter in the direction he will probably pursue there is no better authority than Sir Harry Hamilton Johnston, the famous African explorer and administrator, vice-president of the Royal Geographical Society, vice-president of the Royal Anthropological Institute, and organizer of the very protectorate within the bounds of which Mr. Roosevelt has been licensed by British authority to hunt. Sir Harry Johnston commanded the scientific expedition to Mount Kilimanjaro in behalf of the Royal Geographical Society and also an expedition to Lakes Nyassa and Tanganyika, and is special commissioner, and therefore actual ruler, of the interesting African kingdom of Uganda, whose dynasty, now civilized and Christianized, is remotely descended from the ancient Hamitic race of Northern Africa. In Sir Harry Johnston Mr. Roosevelt has had a worthy predecessor, and no one will follow Mr. Roosevelt's experiences with keener interest than this typical Briton of the class that made the British empire what it is.

Carrying a Hunter's Camping Kit Across Country in East Africa

Sir Harry Johnston believes that Mr. Roosevelt will follow the railway far enough to see much that is interesting along the line from the dense vegetation of the coast to the plateau region of plains, valleys with fine forests, mountain ridges and stream. At Lake Hannington, called after the martyred missionary bishop of that name who was killed by natives, Mr. Roosevelt can see more flamingoes than there are perhaps in all the rest of the world. They are mainly around the northern end of the lake and on banks in the midde of the deep blue-green water. Having been unmolested by man, they are quite tame, and are exquisitely beautiful in plumage. The adult bird has a body and neck of rosy pink; the beak is scarlet and purple, and the legs deep rose-pink inclining to scarlet. Underneath his black-pinioned wings the larger feathers are scarlet-crimson, and beautiful crimson crescents tip the tertiaries and wing-coverts on the upper surface of the wings. The belt of flamingoes on the north coast of the lake is nearly a mile broad, and presents a spectacle unsurpassed for exquisite beauty of color and tone, the younger ones, whose tint is that of a pale tea rose, occupying the outer fringe of the semicircle and the tint growing gradually into a sunset cloud, represented by the older birds. The noise is deafening, and all the charm disappears when the flamingoes start on their ungainly flight.

Mr. Roosevelt will probably spend some time at Lake Naivasha, where both people and animals are remarkable. This lake is in the heart of the Masai country, whose people, once the terror of East Africa, are now industrious and pacific. In their fighting days the Masai swept whole districts clear of their inhabitants, dooming to slavery those who did not perish in war. Now the Masai have rich and profitable farms; they earn money and wear clothes, and their fighting is devoted to the protection of their homes and crops from dangerous and greedy wild beasts. Great baboons sit in the branches of huge trees, ready to plunder field and orchard at the least opportunity, and the herds of cattle and troops of donkeys have to be safeguarded from the prowling lion and hungry leopard. For, be it remembered, there are leopards, not tigers, in Africa, although the Boers call the leopard by a name that sounds like tiger. There are also no bears in Africa, but both in Masailand and elsewhere Mr. Roosevelt will find dangerous animals enough without the tiger or the bear, with the

The Endowment of Power

TEXT—Acts 1 : 8—"Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you."

PASSING through one of the streets of our city, I saw the following notice in large letters on the side of a building: "Rooms to Let with Power." While I mused the fire burned and I thought of the building, its location and capacity; I thought of its endowment of power and of the product of that power when properly utilized. Then I thought of man, whose body in the Scriptures is spoken of as a house, and of Christ standing at the door knocking and waiting to be admitted. Then I thought of the changes brought about by the reception of the stranger at the door.

Webster defines power to be "Ability to act, capacity for action, capability of producing effect." This is a true definition physically, morally and spiritually. "Ability to act."

The Holy Ghost is one with the Father and the Son. You may not understand the mysterious Trinity; but it is not a new or strange thing to accept and believe that which we cannot comprehend, since we are doing this all the time. We all believe in light, but who can tell what light is, whether a reflection or a substance? We all believe in fire, but who can tell what the mysterious something is, by which matter is consumed? We believe in that marvelous force which we call electricity, but who can tell what it is? And so we believe in God, whose works speak to us of his existence, wisdom and power. Paul says: "The invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead." Yet who can comprehend God? To comprehend God would be to be greater than God. The finite cannot take in the infinite.

A Memorable Gathering

That was a memorable meeting at which all the disciples were present. After convincing Thomas that He had risen from the dead, and Thomas made his confession, he told the disciples that they were not quite ready for the work to which he was about to assign them, and that they "should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which, saith he, ye have heard of me."

But when, say you, did the disciples have any promise concerning the endowment of power? It was just before His crucifixion, when giving them his parting blessing he said, "It is expedient that I go away, for if I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I go I will send Him." After the ascension the disciples returned to Jerusalem and assembled in an upper room, to wait for the fulfilment of the promise Christ made them touching the descent of the Holy Ghost. In the second chapter of the Acts of the Apostles we read: "And when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place. And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them; and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost and began to speak with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance." Up to this time the disciples were weak as other men. After this they were unlike other men. Without the Spirit, Peter trembled in the presence of the little maid-servant. With the Spirit, he withstood princes and kings.

The Power of the Spirit

The reception of this power did not change the outward appearance of the disciples. They retained their peculiar traits of character—but these were turned into new channels. The evidence of their having received the Holy Ghost was not made known by what they professed or even experienced, but by what they did. At the gate of the temple, called "Beautiful," lay a poor man lame from his birth. Peter and John, on their way to the temple to pray, saw him and had compassion on him, and Peter said: "Silver and gold have we none, but such as we have give we thee. In the name of Jesus Christ, rise and walk." And he arose and went before them into the temple, leaping and praising God. For this good act the disciples are cast into prison, and Ananias the high priest, and Caiaphas and Alexander sent for the disciples, and when they were come into their midst they asked, "By what power or by what name have ye done this?" This is no uncommon thing in our day. Men want to find out the secret of power—what is it and how may it be obtained? This is true of church and state. Looking into the history of the men who have moved the world in their day and generation, we seek to find out the secret of their power. It was not so much what the disciples of our Lord said as what they did. They went forth and wrought wonders in the eyes of the people, and men, seeing their works, inquired for the secret of their power. The sole aim of the followers of Christ should be to be a repository of the excellence of the power lodged with the apostles and bequeathed to their successors for all time.

Laboring for Humanity

Our age has been made prominent by the development of material forces. We speak of the power of the press, the power of steam, the power of the electric current, the power of associated action, the power of popular government, the power of thought, which is next to the power of God—and this last is the source of all power—material, mental, moral and spiritual. Man is the laggard; God is the untiring worker. So he who receives God into his life must, in order to retain him, be ever active. "We cease at once to work and live." If your faith fails to make you active in the work of the world's welfare, it is a dead faith and worthless.

The Deity is, in a degree, dependent upon human action. God cannot do man's work without man's consent and co-operation. In a true and awful sense, God's operations are conditioned on ours. This view of God does not in any sense limit his power, but it exalts the agent to a dizzy height of responsibility. Now, while it does not take anything of greatness from the Almighty, it does give us to see, as in no other light, our high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Are the heathen to be saved? Then one of us must put himself or herself into harmony with God's plan and purpose. If this were not so, it would be the height of folly for us to give our millions for missions. If God worked outside human agency, then all we would find it necessary to do to make our desires known concerning our brother man would be to leave the work for Him to look after, without the expenditure of strength or money by us.

The Great Spiritual Forces

To be strong to labor for the good of humanity we must have the baptism of power spoken of in our text, and this can only be obtained after the same manner the disciples received it. They were found waiting upon God for the fulfilment of the promise made through Jesus Christ. Prayer and faith are the mightiest forces in the universe. Development, culture, refinement, scholarship may do much for a man, but having all these, there may be the one thing lacking. To be born of the Spirit, to be filled with grace, to be baptized with the Holy Ghost and made meet for the Master's use and service is the essential qualification for great usefulness in the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

When I was a pastor in New York I was privileged to visit a great silver factory. While there my attention was called to a silver cup which had been made by a very skilled artisan. It stood upon a small table before a competent workman. It had been perfectly formed by the silversmith, beautifully engraved, touched with every witchery of beauty by the cunning hand of skill. But something was lacking to make it all it was designed to be. Now it must be welded to a pure metal; a gold lining is the next step toward its finish. Gold foil was placed within it, and it was filled to the lip with a gold solution; yet there it stood with the gold within its embrace, but unassimilated; another power must be invoked to complete the work. So the workman took the poles of a powerful battery and touched the sides of the cup, and in an instant the gold and the silver became one.

Let us not overlook the fact that as the physical forces are at the command of man, so are the forces of the great spiritual thought battery. The great work of the church is to bring man, by the mechanism of the means of grace, into saving connection with Jesus Christ. In driving piles a machine is used by which a large weight is lifted up and then made to fall upon the head of the pile; of course, the higher the weight is lifted the more powerful is the blow which it gives when it descends. Now, if we would fall upon our age and come down upon society with ponderous blows, we must see to it that we are uplifted to the highest spiritual plane of Christian living. All power will depend upon the elevation of our spirits and our nearness to God. Prayer, meditation, communion are like the windlass to lift us up aloft. "They that wait upon God shall renew their strength, they shall mount up as on the wings of eagles." It is not time lost which we spend in such exercise. It is here the spiritual storage battery is filled. The sole ambition of the Christian, the sole aim of his life, should be to be a repository of the excellency of the power lodged with the apostles and bequeathed to their successors for all time. "Tarry ye at Jerusalem," said the risen Christ, as he soared away, "till ye be endowed with power from on high." This grand endowment will more than make up for a lack in many of the other excellencies. Come in what way it may, let us pray for the endowment of power from on high.

Undermining Sin's Strongholds

It was Paul who made use of that strong expression, "the excellency of the power" or "the exceeding greatness of the power," as we have it in the Revised Version. The other word translated from the Greek "power" is "dynamis." Paul wrote the startling phrase, "Hyperbole of dynamite"—a phrase having a meaning far beyond any that has been thought of from Paul's day to ours.

We live in an age of dynamite. This is one of the most fearful explosives known up to date. Some time ago, I met a gentleman who is engaged in the making of this terrible explosive. He invited me to visit his factory and witness the process of making it. I begged to be excused, as I was not tired of life and did not want to go out of it that way. While in conversation with him he told me the body of dynamite is clay, that contains and holds the explosive spirit or force. There is a spiritual as well as a material dynamite, and the spiritual dynamite, like the dynamite of commerce, is housed in clay. The Christ power was the God power manifest in clay. Spiritual dynamite is what is needed to blast the strongholds of sin. Clay of itself will not do it—human weakness before many of the breastworks of sin is human folly. But human clay mixed with spiritual dynamite, the creature and the Creator, with one purpose, can do almost anything that is worthy of being done. This is God's order, co-partnership. Laborers together with God, the apostle styles it. By this union man is lifted up from helplessness, in which he is able to do nothing, to ability to do all things.

The want of the church to-day is divine dynamite—to shatter the palaces of wickedness, tunnel the mountains of corruption, undermine the strongholds of sin and blow up the gates of hell! It was the power in the disciples of Jesus that enabled them to work so that men exclaimed, "The gods have come down to us." And they only uttered the truth. Jesus was called "Immanuel," meaning "God with us." And the apostle declared "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself."

The Life of God in Man's Soul

In a limited sense, every man who receives the Holy Ghost may be called "Immanuel." God in man is the efficient cause of every good act, and so it may be said that every good man has a divine and a human side. The apostle Peter had a glimpse of this doctrine when he wrote "His divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain to life and godliness . . . exceeding great and precious promises, that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature." This is the true order, God's order, copartnership laborers together with God. By this union man is lifted up until he beholds God face to face, adding to his faith virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience godliness, no longer barren, but abounding in every good word and work. This union of the divine and the human is so essential to life's great work that latter of which his name is so familiarly associated. There is no more terrible animal than the rhinoceros when its sluggish nature is aroused to the fury of combat. There are two kinds of rhinoceros in Africa, the so-called white rhinoceros being simply less dark than the other kind, and not by any means white. An enraged rhinoceros breaks through and crushes nearly every obstacle, and its ugly-looking horn can do more destruction than spear or battle-axe. The elephant is another monster of the wilds that stops at nothing when aroused to anger or affrighted by unexpected attack. To be in the way of a maddened elephant is almost certain death. The lion is classed with the leopard as "vermin," on account of his depredations on flocks and herds, besides occasional attacks on man. Mr. Roosevelt can slay as many lions and leopards as he may see fit. Lion-killing is as perilous as in the days of Gordon-Cumming, but both foreign and native hunters continue to pursue the sport, partly for the excitement and partly, if not chiefly, to get rid of a destructive enemy of humankind.

Mr. Roosevelt will undoubtedly seek out the gorilla, that awful inhabitant of the forest, whose grotesque resemblance to man only emphasizes the unconquerable savagery of its nature. The gorilla is a terrible foe, and a man in the grasp of its powerful arms is crushed like an eggshell. The capture of an adult gorilla would be a feat great enough to give éclat to any expedition.

Another remarkable people whom President Roosevelt is likely to meet are the Anderobos, a race much inferior to the Masai. They live in the dense woods of the Mau and Nandi plateaux, and shoot their game with poisoned arrows, in this resembling the Indians of British Guiana, who, however, use a blowpipe in sending their arrows on their mission of death. All these tribes use dogs in hunting.

In the Tall Jungle Grass, East Africa

The scenery of the Rift Valley, which Mr. Roosevelt will cross if he pursues the indicated route, is very grand. At one point the traveler can look down five thousand feet to a gleaming river and lake. Fine forests of conifers remind the northern tourist of home, and away to the west, in the distance, is the great blue mass of Mount Elgon.

Mount Elgon is the largest known volcano in the world. The superficies of the whole mass of Mount Elgon is about equal to that of Switzerland, or, to take an American example, it is equal in area to Maryland, with Connecticut added. It is a region of terraces and caves, and in caverns, often protected by waterfalls tumbling over the rocks above, cave-men can be found living as the cave-men of Europe may have lived before the dawn of history.

The kingdom of Uganda, where Mr. Roosevelt is likely to spend part of his time, is one of the most fascinating regions of Africa. It was a crime there to go unclothed long before Christian missionaries taught the Gospel and the proprieties to the people of that region. Uganda was a powerful State, with an organized government, a despotic king and a feudal nobility, when the first white explorer was received in its royal court. It is now a British protectorate and is one of the most flourishing communities in Africa. The natives are Christians, and follow peaceful pursuits. They are still ruled by their king, with the advice of the British Commissioner, Sir Harry Johnston, to whom we are indebted for much of the information contained in this article. Should Sir Harry meet Mr. Roosevelt he will undoubtedly do all in his power to make the journey of our ex-President what every American sincerely hopes it will be—both pleasant and successful.

Jesus himself added, "If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch and is withered." Blighted is surely and completely as the branch is when cut off from the parent trunk or vine.

This is the central reality and meaning of redemption—the indwelling of the Holy Ghost—the life of God in the soul of man. This is what is meant by living in the Spirit and walking in the Spirit. This union makes the good man. He is the expression of God's thought, of God's purpose and of God's plan in the world. He lives for God, thinks for God, sees for God, hears for God and acts for God. Paul understood this when he exclaimed, "For me to live is Christ." In one of his epistles he said, "I live," and then corrected himself and exclaimed, "No, not I, but Christ liveth in me." The fact is just this: Christ waits to be incarnated in every human heart. Hear him: "Behold, I stand at the door and knock: if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in."

Oh for a pentecostal baptism upon the Church of God! This is the power that gives fire and efficacy to prayer, life to exhortation and impulse to nobler service. "But suppose," says one, "I should receive the baptism of power and no good results follow, what am I to think?" A few years ago a young engineer was being examined for graduation, when his examiner proposed the following question: "Suppose you have a steam pump constructed for a ship, under your own supervision, and know that everything is in perfect order, yet when you throw out the hose it will not work?" "I should think, sir," said the young man, "there must be a defect somewhere." "But the supposition is that everything is in perfect order." "Then, sir, I should look over the side of the ship to see if the sea had run dry!" So if, when you receive the baptism of power—the Holy Ghost—into your heart, and no good results follow in your life, it will be time to look out and see if God has vanished from the universe. A powerless Christian ought to be as great a misnomer as a forceless thunderbolt. Oh, what an army the Church ought to be, enrolled under the Lord of Hosts—strong in faith, strong in prayer, but above all strong in God and the power of his might!

When a lecturer on electricity wants to show an example of a human body surcharged with fire, he places a person on a stool with glass legs. Presently you are asked to come near and hold your hand close to his person; when you do so a spark of fire shoots out toward you; the man is actually filled with the electric current. It was this isolation that made the face of Moses to shine, so that the children of Israel could not look at him. Withdrawal from this busy world, taking time to be alone, is one of the secrets of obtaining power. Do you suppose it possible for a man to enter into the secret place of meditation and prayer without the world knowing it when he comes out? I tell you nay! if he has been in the garden of the Lord, his very garments will exhale odors and spices. So, if we would have our souls surcharged with the fire of God, so that those who come within our influence shall feel our presence, we must draw near to the source of power—to the throne of the heavenly grace. Christ has given us a recipe for obtaining this power: "Enter into thy closet and shut the door (isolate thyself from the world), and pray to thy Father and he will reward thee openly."

It is impossible for us to overestimate the power that lies latent in many of our churches. We talk of the power that was latent in steam until Watt evoked its spirit from the waters; of the power that was latent in the skies until science climbed their heights and seized the spirit of the thunder, chained and harnessed it. Yet what are these to the moral power that lies asleep in the pews of many of our churches, waiting the electric touch of the Holy Ghost to arouse into active service?

Now, as all the forces welded to matter lie latent and inert until developed and applied by human ingenuity, so the spiritual forces obey the human summons. Listen: "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence and the violent take it by force." The steam engine is a lifeless, powerless thing without the motive force of water vaporized to steam by heat. Prayer is the steam power, begotten by the spiritual fire of the divine Spirit, by which all the machinery of the church should be run, from the pulpit to the schoolroom. Mighty praying produces mighty results. Looking into the history of the past, we find all great movements begun, continued and ended with prayer. Sermons marked by special results have always been preceded by mighty praying. Paul tested this power in Jerusalem, in Antioch, in Athens, in Corinth, and in Rome also. When imprisoned and persecuted, the power was equal to the emergency. At Thessalonica they put him in prison and thought to keep him there, but an earthquake came and the prison doors flew open. If they put him in jail, it was the salvation of the jailer. And if they drove him from city to city it was that he might scatter the good seed of the kingdom. This is the power needed to-day in the pulpits of our land. A nice arrangement of our thoughts, fittingly expressed, is all right and becoming. "But not in word only, but in power," is the apostolic injunction. It looked like the height of folly when the apostles looked out upon the conversion of the world. Twelve poor men, without influence, without purse or scrip; what could they do? No wonder they had many doubts and fears. But what a change came over their feelings when they heard their Lord and Master utter his commission!

Yonder is the scene of his conflict; the garden where he sweat, as it were, great drops of blood; the judgment hall, the hill Calvary and the empty tomb, from which he walked forth the conqueror of death; and now, with the world under the range of his vision, he exclaims in the ears of his listening disciples: "All power is given unto me in heaven above and on the earth beneath; go, ye, therefore, into all the world and preach the Gospel, and lo! I am with you unto the end of the ages."

☛ A SPECIAL WORD TO OUR JUNIOR AGENTS ☚

LAST week we promised to give you, in this issue, a few extracts from the many letters that come to us from our Boys and Girls in all parts of the country. The following will give you a little idea of the successful efforts of three of our Junior Agents and why the work pays.

* * *

How is this for a record? Max Taylor, of Manchester, Conn., began by ordering some of our least expensive premiums; each success meant a bigger one. On February 13 he wrote us: "I never was so pleased in my life as when my Press-Button knife came; it is slick." On March 1 he writes again: "I have received my ring (Reward No. 12, Gold-Filled Signet Ring), and am going to have my monogram put on it;" and adds, "I am working now for Premium 18, the Automatic Rotary Printing Press." On March 26 his order for copies of the next week's CHRISTIAN HERALD completed the number necessary to secure this splendid premium, and to-day this boy has his Printing Press, in addition to his many other premiums.

George Lenhard, of Paducah, Ky., wrote to us shortly after he commenced the work: "I sold twenty copies this week, with little trouble;" while from Joseph Ratcliffe, Baltic, Conn., we have the following: "With this order I will have two hundred copies to my credit, and wish to get Premium No. 18, Automatic Rotary Printing Press. As I had to sell 165 copies to earn this, I am still 35 copies ahead. When THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Carrier Bag came, I put it round my neck and was off with my papers in a jiffy."

When you consider the rewards that we offer in addition to a cash commission on every copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that you sell, it will pay YOU to begin now, and hustle like these fellows, before some other boy or girl gets ahead of you and secures all the best customers in your neighborhood. Remember that "the early bird catches the worm."

PEASANT LIFE AMONG THE SERVIANS

An Anti-Austrian Demonstration in Belgrade

Mihailo Zivkovitch, Minister of War

Even the School Children Demonstrate Against Austria

By FELIX J. KOCH

SPUNKY little Servia, a mere pawn on the checker-board of Europe, has dared to raise her voice against the greed of the Austrian. While the newspaper dispatches have been chronicling how troops were being put aboard at Cattaro, Zara and elsewhere, down in Servia the king militant has not been slow to marshal his forces as well. Fortunately, the war cloud has passed over for the present and the danger of a clash in the Balkans is averted.

Serb peasant-life is as picturesque as any in all the world. Nowhere does one get the charm of this so well as in the little towns, such as Pirot. The train pulls into Pirot from Nisch, the military city, at 4:05 in the afternoon. Down at the station, olden-time money-changers loiter. The coinage of the Balkans is indeed varied, and these changers do a land-office business. For those coming in from Bulgaria there is a customs-revision, but the tourist avoids all this by leaving his valise at the station. Thence he advances, foot-loose, into the city, for over Southern Europe the stations always stand at some distance from the towns themselves. Pirot has ten thousand population. A few are Turks; the majority are pure Serb. It is a court town, and the carpet industry is the prevailing one. Pirot suffered greatly by the war of 1885 with Bulgaria. On November 28, that year, Prince Alexander entered the place, and here, by intervention of the Austrian Ambassador to Servia, that day a truce was reached. Pirot lies in the heart of the country of the Serb-Bulgar war—at the foot of a great stone mountain-range, covered with scrub, and almost at the end of the valley. Its small houses, but few of a second floor, with red roofs, and with a church at one end, form a tempting prospect for the lover of folk-life. Behind the hedges other houses arise—farms, too, can be seen on the mountains.

Girls, in the dress of continental Europe, save for red or blue stockings, rising from clogs, stand out, eyeing any stranger who may visit the place. At the double windows of the houses, close up to the square, red roofs, still other girls sit, heavy rosaries about their necks. Some of them are seated at work in the doorway. One with a baby in a blanket, all lined in white, is at play. From this point of view extends the main street of the settlement. Some soldiers dance in a circle around about a bagpiper. At another doorstep some women sit in a row, each with a round red cap, bearing a triangle of black on the front, these caps resting lightly in the hair. Gay ribbons fly in the breeze.

Many houses have lemons ripening in the windows. Fruit stores are numerous. Old men come out of them with bags of the goats'-hair cloth on their shoulders. Girls, too, emerge, their hair filled with flowers. Some old men sit by the road, under the trees, smoking at tables and glancing over their papers. Not many are in the actual national costume, yet the bright colors in the women's garb give an air of gaiety to the scene.

A picturesque wooden bridge spans the river. Farther up the road, then, is the old town. We are lucky in our visit to Pirot, for a great wedding celebration is in progress. Out in the street, before the groom's home, a garland of white satin is hung at the door for the occasion. In the garden stand two or three tables, each with white tablecloths, dishes and decanters of wine. Here the parents and elderly guests are seated. In the garden is the bride, arrayed in white, with white flowers on her breast and in her hair, while a veil hangs down over all. She is a rosy-cheeked lass. Beside her, resting on her arm, appears the groom. Out in the street, in front of the house, is gathered in one group well-nigh the whole village. Through this crowd there winds, almost imperceptibly, a long chain of young people, dancing the kola, the national dance of the Balkans. Four gipsies, with violins and 'cellos, furnish the music.

The people stand about talking, and all very gay, thanks to the great amount of colors. The girls are hatless, with hair combed back from the forehead, and some flowers in the tresses. Over the waist they wear a vest of many colors. The wedding guests are known from the rest by sprigs of leaves on the lapel; otherwise the whole village is here, and they mingle in the crowd. Later the bridal pair venture in. The groom appears shy, and the bride leads him proudly on. Little girls, with their hair in braids and tied by tiny colored strings, dance together not far from the refreshment table. Many of the girls wear golden "dowries" on the breast. They have a good time, one and all. Their faces are quite sweet, though clearly of the peasant type. Some of the richer women wear jackets of black satin, edged with gold.

TEACHING CHILDREN TO PLAY

An Exciting Tug of War

Resting on the "Teeter" Between Games

IF a visitor to the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, in New York City, on a recent afternoon, had followed a large number of people who were making their way to the roof, he would have wondered, when he stepped from the elevator, if he were still in the city or had been suddenly transported by flying machine to the woods of Maine or the forests of Norway. Pine trees grew on all sides and raised their pointed crests against the blue of the sky, while the lower evergreens formed an effective screen before the brick and tile parapets of the Waldorf. Here and there about this elevated forest were groups of boys and girls in costume, all chatting gaily and laughing merrily, and all evidently in a state of suppressed excitement over the interesting programme for the afternoon in which they were to take such a prominent part.

There were bonnie Scotch lassies, with plaids draped across their shoulders; little Dutch maids, in short kirtles, laced bodices, fascinating white caps coming well down over the ears, and wearing wooden shoes. They looked for all the world as if they had stepped out of the frieze on some nursery wall, or animated little drawings by Penfield. There were winsome little women from further north, Swedes and Norwegians, with rosy cheeks, blue eyes, and long yellow braids, showing they were true daughters of the sea rovers. Hardly had these shifted in the kaleidoscopic scene when there would appear a group in Hungarian costume, and these would be followed by the little maids of Italy, bubbling with the vivacity of the south. All of those in costume were not of the races they represented, but they took the parts so well that the onlooker was none the wiser. In fact, these little people were the children who are picked up in the various crowded sections of New York "and taught to play," under the auspices of the Parks and Playgrounds Association, which has exerted an enormous influence for good in the comparatively short time it has been at work to brighten and develop the lives of the little people whose home is the tenement and whose sole place of recreation is bounded in two directions—by the block on which they live and by the curbing of the gutters on the other two.

The afternoon's entertainment was to show to those interested what has been accomplished by the workers of the association and to enlist their further co-operation in the coming summer's campaign. The roof playground of the hotel had been supplied with apparatus, slides, swings, and the ever-popular "teeter," and the "play leaders" took their charges through the various sports and games which they had been taught, as well as through the graceful steps of the bleking of Sweden, the tarentelle of Italy, the kull danzen of Holland, and the highland fling. As a climax, there appeared an Indian tepee and a fierce band of New York Indians, who looked fully as savage as any of those who fought the early Dutch settlers on Corlear's Hook.

A Group of Holland Maids

The entertainment attracted much attention to the work of the association. The methods employed are unique and well worth copying in other cities. When the association investigated conditions it was found that a boy or girl in the tenement district is practically confined in playtime to the street in front of his or her block. Central Park is so far away that it sounds to most of them as if it were in a distant country. They seldom went to the smaller parks, of which there are far too few, even if one existed in their neighborhood. The boys were divided into gangs under young leaders, who, by superior will power and strength, had become directors of the pastimes, and in some cases the depredations, of their following. If a boy tried to play on a neighboring street the boys of that block would attack him. Often the lads of one street were in battle with those of another. The covers of ash-cans were taken as shields and bottles for missiles, the iron corks would be reserved for the final volley. Large numbers would be cut by the flying glass or knocked down in the mêlée. The workers of the association began to direct the energy of the boys into safer channels. The young men would go to a district, get acquainted with the boys, and, by superior knowledge of ways to have a good time, take the place of the vicious gang leader. They would take them on trips to places where there was room enough to play baseball. Rival teams from different streets were organized, and the energy which formerly found vent in a street fight found a new outlet with the bat and catcher's gloves. Last year over seventy teams played all summer for medals, which were offered by a New York publication. Heretofore the boys had gambled on their games, and always asked, "What is der in it fer a feller?" when approached on the subject of forming a team. The medals proved a satisfactory substitute, and this year probably more games than ever will be played.

The young women play leaders usually got "an introduction" to a district through some settlement worker who had already gained the confidence of the people in the locality. The newcomer would tell stories, show the girls new games to play, and take them on trips to Central Park. The association would take some vacant lot, fix it up with swings and other play apparatus dear to the heart of childhood, and the play leader became a distinct factor in the life of the district and a strong influence for good. The children learn many things unconsciously, and absorb new ideals against which they would rebel if they came to them in some other form. One hundred and fifty dollars will pay all expenses of a playground and provide happiness for hundreds of children for an entire summer. It is well worth the support of all who are interested in ameliorating the condition of the children of the poor in New York.

Over five thousand children came under the influence of the play leaders for two months of last summer, and in some districts the work has been continued through the winter. The officers wish to show the city what can be accomplished in this children's work, bring about the establishment of proper places of recreation throughout Greater New York, and have the work taken up in time by the municipality. The gain in health, morals and general contentment cannot be overestimated. Something like this will have to be done if the second generation in the tenement districts does not turn out to be physically, if not mentally, degenerate. London is now reaping the results of congestion in young lives stunted in the narrow, crooked streets, beneath the city's smoky pall. Playgrounds would also be one of the factors in the battle with the white plague.

The children take back what they have learned to their homes and the parents become interested, and in more than one instance the "play leader" has been asked by the adults to come and live in the neighborhood, thus making an opening for more advanced settlement work.

Treadmill Heroes

SOMEWHERE we saw a picture which is well fitted to hearten those whose lives are humdrum, only a bundle of weaknesses, apparently with no achievements and no possibilities that make it worth while to live. It was just a pitiful brute, a poor discouraged-looking horse, hitched to the end of a beam, tramping round and round in a hot and dusty ring. His head hung down, his feet seemed to drag, not with the severity, but with the endlessness and bootlessness of the toil. One felt like saying, in the slang of the day, "Well, that is the limit." To be a noble war-horse, a petted saddle-horse, a wonderful race-horse, might not be bad; but a treadmill-horse—to go round and round in the same old, narrow track from morning till night, day after day, wearing the same old harness, tugging at the same old load, and getting nowhere—save us from such a life as that!

But looking further, something more was seen. The beam to which the horse was hitched was attached to a cylinder, and around the cylinder a rope was wound, which passed over a pulley and down the hill to the river's brink; and at the end of the rope was a block of stone, which the horse was hoisting, as he had hoisted hundreds already, to build the abutment of a bridge over which, when completed, splendid railway trains would flash, with all their wealth of freight and human lives.

It is possible for us all to be heroes of the treadmill, of the common life—in the home, in the school, in the workshop, in the undistinguished business or professional office—just patiently, earnestly, strenuously going round and round; but lifting—nobly, bravely lifting the blocks of character that shall help to build a better and more beautiful social structure; above all, that shall help to build the glorious kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

God's angels drop, like grains of gold,
Our duties midst life's shining sands,
And from them, one by one, we mould
Our own bright crown with patient hands.
From dust and dross we gather them;
We toil and stoop, for love's sweet sake,
To find each worthy act a gem
In glory's kingly diadem,
Which we may daily richer make.

Castro the Castaway

CIPRIANO CASTRO, the deposed dictator of Venezuela and the most peppery despot known in South American politics, is planning a coup for the recovery of his lost prestige. Returning from his exile in Europe, he attempted to land in Trinidad, from which point of vantage he could have directed operations against President Gomez; but our government and that of Great Britain simultaneously decided to shut him out of Trinidad. He succeeded, however, in landing on the island of Martinique, and was plotting to go to Caracas, where, as he boastfully declared, he expected to regain the Presidency "without firing a shot." France, however, has notified him to clear out of Martinique. The "Napoleon of the Andes," as his admirers called him, has no asylum of refuge in sight. The nations, acting as a police force, have warned him to "move on." But where shall he go? Little Holland will have none of him. It may be that he will yet succeed in eluding them all and stealing back to Venezuela. Of course, if President Gomez prefers to have Castro back for some inscrutable reason of his own, it would be hard to deny him that pleasure; but the fiery little dictator has been so much of an international nuisance that the better policy would seem to be to keep him at a safe distance, in some new Elba or St. Helena, where he would be harmless.

Early Christian Song

THOSE who understand the value of Gospel song in the winning of souls will be greatly interested in the news that a distinguished archæologist, Sir Rendel Harris, has discovered, during his investigations in Palestine, what is doubtless the oldest Christian hymn-book in existence. It is a manuscript in Syriac, containing some 60 hymns, of which 42 are purely Christian, the remainder being Jewish. This notable find, which belongs to the last half of the first century (about 70 A.D.), has the appearance of having been used in some Palestinian church. Professor Harris announces that these Christian Psalms, the very earliest thus far discovered, "are warm with the fires of spiritual life." They are modeled upon the form of the Psalms of David, but they contain many references to salvation through Jesus Christ. It is believed that they were the literary product of Christian writers who lived not long after the resurrection and ascension, and while many of the older followers of the new religion were yet throbbing with the personal recollection of the Redeemer, whom they had seen with their own eyes.

But while the whole Christian world is soon to share this treasure, which Professor Harris is now translating, the strains to which these early Christian hymns were sung must be forever lost. Very few Christian hymns have come down to us from antiquity until this new discovery, and these without the musical setting. The oldest thus far known was a "Hymn of Praise to Christ," which was current in the fourth century. Yet we cannot doubt that in the great assemblages that greeted the Saviour during his earthly ministry there were many psalms and hymns and spiritual songs employed. These have all passed into oblivion. Who shall tell the theme and the measure of the song the disciples sang at the close of the first sacramental feast and just before they went out with Jesus to Olivet? Lost to us are those wondrous strains that were heard when Paul and Silas made the interior of their Philippian jail vocal at midnight; forgotten, too, the sweet spiritual songs with which the Christians of Ephesus and Colossæ encouraged one another. They are gone, with all the marvelous music of the great Jewish temple, which, in Solomon's day, possessed the grandest orchestra the world had ever known.

In these days of multiplied facilities for the preservation of music, no really good hymn need ever be lost, and it is within every one's reach to do as Goethe advised, "Every day at least hear a little song or read a good poem." With so many advantages, we should be a very musical people.

The Ex-President Abroad

PROBABLY no part of the ex-President's trip will be remembered more pleasantly than the few hours spent in Italy before embarking on the steamer which carried him from Naples to Mombasa.

The landing was a welcome relief. "I don't like life aboard ship," he declared; "confinement frets me. I do not need rest. I do not want to rest." Judging from this Mr. Roosevelt's health could not be better for the task of hunting across Africa. There is a rumor of a Somali uprising, but that does not disturb Mr. Roosevelt, either.

A little American girl on a tender, young America at home will be glad to know, was the first person to greet Mr. Roosevelt as the ship came to anchor. All of the ships were gaily decorated, and from a band on one steamer's deck came the music which brings off the hats of every citizen of the United States, especially if he hears it in a foreign land—"The Star-Spangled Banner." This was a good beginning, and the Italians followed it up by cheering enthusiastically every time they saw him. Their good will was demonstrated in odd ways at times. One present was a crate filled with bee-hive hats. When the German Ambassador delivered an invitation from the Kaiser to meet him in Berlin, Mr. Roosevelt accepted, and said meanwhile he would "prepare himself to tell how it felt to bear the white man's burden in Africa." The Kaiser's message ended with "Weidmannsheil!" (hail to the successful huntsman.) This greatly pleased Mr. Roosevelt, and he said that in a year from now he could tell better whether the wish was well deserved.

Mr. Roosevelt was very anxious to stop at Messina. As for any personal danger he said he felt like the man "who was prepared to eat anything, providing that it didn't bite him first." He visited the Duke and Duchess of Aosta, and received from the Duchess valuable suggestions, as she has hunted in Africa. Several other invitations were accepted for Mr. Roosevelt's return. He will accept one to call at the Vatican during his short stay in Rome, as well as to see the King and Queen.

It has been twenty-two years since Mr. Roosevelt was in Italy. Then he was on his wedding trip, and when the sun shone out over the Bay of Naples and colored the slopes of Vesuvius he said he wished Mrs. Roosevelt were again with him. His reputation for strenuosity had preceded him, and one correspondent jokingly said that it was noticed that the ex-President did not shoot out the lights in the Aosta Palace. Many in Italy still have the impression that civilization ends somewhere back of the Catskills, and the red Indian still indulges in scalping when tourists are in season.

Oil Men and the Tariff

IN the course of the tariff discussion in the House of Representatives, there have been several interesting surprises. One of these was the vote on the Norris amendment to the Payne bill, admitting crude petroleum and its products at a nominal duty of one per cent. ad valorem, which is equivalent to placing it on the free list. This was finally amended, making petroleum and its products entirely free. This includes refined petroleum and, in fact, all the oil our people now use for fuel or illuminating purposes. A hard fight was made to impose a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem, but the temper of the legislators clearly favored a tariff that would help the independent oil producers here, and relieve them from the crushing competition of the trust.

Our New Serial

NEXT week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will publish the opening chapters of a new serial by Eleanor H. Porter, the author of those charming stories, "Beside Still Waters" and "The Transformation of Margaret." Many letters from our readers testified to the popularity of those tales, and the new story is even more thrilling and fascinating. It appeals especially to musicians. The hero is descended from musical ancestors and inherits their genius. In his early childhood he becomes a newsboy, and the life of the juvenile waif in a great city is vividly portrayed in several chapters. His vicissitudes, as he struggles to rise and as rewards, one by one, come to him, form intensely interesting reading. A peculiarly pleasing part to many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be certain chapters dealing, as in Mrs. Porter's earlier stories, with life at Mont-Lawn, the beautiful home for children at Nyack, for many years conducted by this journal. Read it, and get your friends to read it. It will make not only a refreshing diversion for warm weather, but it will throw a new light upon many obscure phases of life and will strengthen the bonds of democracy and fraternity.

The Terrors of Tabriz

THE late Shah of Persia, among the last acts of his life, granted his people a constitution. He had scarcely signed the document before the pen dropped out of his fingers, which soon became numb in death. His successor delayed the granting of the favor to the people and kept the iron hand of absolutism upon them. There was such a popular revolt that the crown was compelled to yield representation to its subjects; but the people were dissatisfied with the situation, and a bloody revolt is now taking place in Persia. The revolutionists have possession of Tabriz, the chief commercial city of Western Persia. Recently they have been reinforced by an Irishman and an American, both of whom are busily drilling the volunteers. The government troops and bands of wild tribesmen are closely surrounding the city. The citizens of the beleaguered metropolis are in consternation. A fearful tragedy is staring them in the face. If the city holds out, thousands must die of starvation; while if it falls, probably tens of thousands will be put to the sword. Non-combatants who may leave the doomed city have little hope of succor, for even if they escape the bloodthirsty tribes who are blocking the roads, they will be cut down by the half-civilized troops of horsemen that have come up with the prospect of plunder. If Tabriz were within reach of Europe, philanthropic people would be busily preparing help against the inevitable ruin; but in Asia there is little humanitarian sentiment, and the inhabitants of Tabriz have nowhere to look for assistance.

Popular liberty during the world's history has usually been purchased with blood. Even in modern times, peaceful revolutions have been the exceptions, the most notable of which is that of Japan, which in thirty-five years has been transformed from an absolute despotism to a monarchy so limited as to be almost a democracy, without the recruiting of an army or the firing of a cannon. The people of Turkey are succeeding in their revolution, happily, without war. The peace, however, was brought about by a surrender of part of the royal prerogative by the Sultan. In Persia they are following the usual course and are fighting it out with the keen edge of the sword, and horror on horror is the legitimate result. It is to be hoped that out of the conflict and suffering will come enlarged national liberty.

He hath nothing left him in the siege, and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee in all thy gates. (Deut. 28 : 55.)

The Menace of a Woman's Hat

Mayor Bookwalter, of Indianapolis, Ind., met with a singular accident the other day, which might have proved a very serious one. He was a passenger on a southbound Illinois Street car, on his way to his office. At Washington Street, the Mayor stepped from the car. As he did so, a woman just in front of him turned her head and the steel point of a feather in her headgear entered the corner of his right eye. Almost blinded and suffering intense pain, the Mayor hurried to an eye specialist. The accident was, of course, unintentional; but it is one that could have been avoided with a little more care in the trimming and motion of the hat. The monstrous hats worn by some women have been a source of great public inconvenience. They have served as barriers to the eyes of the members of many audiences. A number of pastors of leading metropolitan pulpits, on this account, have asked the women of the congregations to remove their hats before the preaching service began.

There are many injuries done to body, mind and soul that are unintentional. The careless toss of the woman's head that caused her steel-pointed feather to pierce the eye of the Mayor only illustrates the ten thousand ills of life caused by simple carelessness. We are not only responsible for the evil that we intend, but also for the many injuries which we could avoid.

Hear my voice, ye careless daughters. (Isa. 32 : 9.)

Severed Hand Grew Again

A workman in a mill in the West met with an accident in which his hand was entirely severed from the arm. The arm was speedily bound to prevent the man's bleeding to death, and he was hurried to the hospital. The severed hand was taken along also. The surgeon put the hand back against the arm where it belonged, and fastened the members together. The surgical experiment proved to be a success. The hand has grown fast, and it will not be very long until he will have almost as good use of his hand as he had before. The hand apart from the arm would soon have perished. It was only by having an organic relation to the wrist that it could have life or render service. It is only as the branch is fastened to the vine, so that the life current may be sent from one to the other, that there can be any fruit produced. It is only when the Christian has vital relation to Christ that he can have any spiritual life or bear any spiritual fruit. There are so many members of the Church who are useless because they are severed from the body, because they are the branches without any relation to the vine.

As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me. (John 15 : 4.)

Faithful Maid-Servant Fifty-nine Years

At South River, N. J., recently, a family celebrated the golden anniversary of the employment of their maid-servant. This event brought to light the fact that Ellen Hume has been employed as a servant in the family of John T. Morris, of Philadelphia, and that of his father, for fifty-nine continuous years. When she began her service with the parents of her present employer she was a rosy-cheeked Irish girl, just out of her teens, and came from the home of Edward C. Dale, a son of the commodore who fought by Paul Jones' side and was the first man from the Bonhomme Richard to board the Serapis. To a reporter she said:

"Of course, I did not know then that I was beginning anything any one would ever want to write about," said the old woman in the Morris drawing-room, recently, "and I don't know why you should write about me now. I've done my work the best I knew how and had the kindest treatment, and that's all there is to it." Asked about the servant problem of to-day, she said: "I think the mistresses themselves are a good deal to blame. You see, most young ladies are brought up nowadays without knowing anything about housekeeping. Their mothers want them to have pretty hands and the like, and even good servants can't work well under such ladies. They don't know how to manage. Then there are so many girls to-day who would rather work in stores and factories than in homes. They want to dress fine, and they think they can be freer than when they hire out. But I don't believe they get as much after all, for if you do the work you're paid for in a good home, and take an interest in the people you serve, it is very pleasant. And if you're faithful, you won't come to want in old age," she added, with an air of great contentment.

There is no more perplexing problem in the domestic life of America than that of the servant question, to which there are two sides. The long service of Miss Hume is a compliment to herself and the family which has employed her. There are leaders in society and queens on thrones who have not poured so much of good into life or gotten so much out of it as this patient, competent, industrious, true, loyal servant of well-nigh sixty years. Human society would not be far from an ideal condition if every one would do as Ellen Hume has done in performing, in the best manner possible, the simple duties that came to her in the place where her lot was cast. Much of Christ's command is obeyed in unselfish service for others and much of the true happiness and honor of life come from such humble service.

Whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant. (Matt. 20 : 27.)

Burial of Old Prairie Dogs

The prairie dogs at the New York Zoo have a habit of killing off the old members of the colony or burying them alive, and, while there are forty or fifty pups born every year, the whole colony remains no more than fifty in number each year, and there has never been a dead prairie dog found. They dispatch the old members of the colony and bury them out of sight. These funeral obsequies are usually performed in the night time, but recently they took place in the day time. Raymond L. Ditmars, curator of the Zoo, thus describes the burial exercises:

"When I got to the dog village," Mr. Ditmars said, in telling of the incident, "there was a big crowd standing near one end. I pushed my way to the fence and saw the prairie dogs skurrying about. Several were digging nervously in one corner of the corral. Nearby was another group vigorously attacking one of the older prairie dogs, which was not defending himself at all. I made inquiries and learned from several of those who had witnessed the earlier stages of the affair that the attack on the old dog had been going on for about five minutes. He was unable to stand up when I got there. Soon the attacking party left him and ran over to where the others were digging. They all pitched in and dug. In a few minutes they had a pretty large hole. They all stopped at once and several ran back to where the old dog was lying. The other dogs seemed on the point of attacking him again, but when they saw him crawling toward the hole they held back and waited. The old dog reached the edge of the hole and tumbled in, head first; then lay quietly at the bottom, looking up at the other dogs gathered around the edge. In a few seconds the villagers began to fill up the hole with dirt. All took part in this operation. The hole was soon filled and the old dog was covered with two feet of earth. The younger prairie dogs ran back and forth on the filled-in hole, apparently packing down the dirt."

Dr. Osler imitates the prairie dogs in his suggestion of chloroform for the aged. But our civilization has one of the best illustrations in its reverence for and tender treatment of the aged. In the heated competition of life the aged are often pushed from many of the callings by the ambitious young, but in the main old people are treated with tenderness and love. Nothing is more uncomely than ingratitude or neglect of aged relatives, and nothing more beautiful than the sympathy and support that loyal children and relatives give to their own aged.

Cast me not off in the time of old age. (Ps. 71 : 9.)

Missionary Work Among Mohammedans

Rev. E. F. Frease, D.D.

A Public Market-Place in Morocco

Bishop Hartzell

By BISHOP J. C. HARTZELL

A YEAR ago last May, Mrs. Hartzell and I attended the World's Sunday School Convention, as guests of the World's Sunday School Association at Rome, when there were present over 1,100 delegates from all parts of the globe. More than half of these were from the United States. With scarce an exception, all of them were earnest Christian workers, especially in the Sunday School, and many of them persons of large means and liberality.

At the request of the president of the association, I arranged for missionary meetings to be held at the Azores, in Gibraltar, Algiers, and other places where there were missions. The visit of these people to the small, independent missions in the city of Algiers made a profound impression upon all. These scattered, independent missions are working among the Mohammedans especially. There are over twenty million Mohammedans in North Africa and over fifty millions in the whole continent of Africa. We were all impressed with the call of God for Christian work among these Mohammedan multitudes.

The United Presbyterians have a great mission among the Mohammedans in Egypt and the Valley of the Nile; but no church organization has any missionary work from Egypt westward, including Morocco. Twenty years ago, the North African Mission, an undenominational organization, began mission work, and has done some excellent pioneer service, but has not begun to establish regular church centres. There have also been a few independent missionaries who have done excellent work.

This large company of Christian workers felt that some great church should go into that section of the continent, and appealed to me as representing the Methodist Episcopal Church. I told them that it would require money and that I must have at least $25,000 a year for five years; as all know that the most difficult mission work in the world is that among the Mohammedans. Besides, I must report the matter to my general Missionary Board in America and have their approval.

Several meetings were held for consultation and prayer. In these meetings were not only Methodists, but Congregationalists, Presbyterians and representatives of other denominations. There was a wonderful spirit of prayer and desire to know the will of the Lord. They began making subscriptions, and in two or three days there were placed in my hands subscriptions to the amount of $50,000, being $10,000 a year for five years. A year ago last November the general committee of the Methodist Episcopal Church approved the opening of the mission, but could make no appropriation, because of the great demands upon its treasury in the many fields already occupied.

With the money that was pledged I have opened the work. My wife, Mrs. Hartzell, has been two months there, and has been an active factor in the work. At every step there have been very clear providential leadings. Without going into details as to how it has been accomplished, we have now the following work:

In Algiers, the capital of Algeria, a city of 150,000 people, we have our largest beginning. Algeria is an empire in size, wonderfully rich in resources, and is a part of the French republic. In a conversation with Premier Clemenceau, in Paris, I was assured by him that, as far as possihle, he would guarantee religious liberty for us and protection. We have there at present two lady missionaries, who have had seventeen years' experience. They have acquired the languages; their work is well developed, especially among the native Kabyles, and they have under their care and influence 250 girls and women, mostly Mohammedans. These ladies have girls' meetings, women's meetings, evangelical meetings, etc. They have in the summer, through the help of friends, a rest home in the mountains. Stories of the blessed effects of the Gospel in this summer resort are thrilling. We have also a school among the French Roman Catholics, who are quite well trained, being taught by a French lady.

Christian literature is one of the great necessities of missionary work among the Mohammedans. The two annual conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Germany, on hearing my story, pledged themselves to raise $500 a year to establish a mission press, where we could print religious literature in the Arabic, or French, or native Kabyle, or Spanish, or any other language of the mission. I was especially fortunate in securing the services of a young German who had just graduated from Strasburg University, and who is a wonderful linguist. He is an acknowledged authority in the Kabylan language. He has mastered the classic Arabic, so that it will be easy for him to prepare literature in the colloquial Arabic. He is now on the field, and we hope soon to have a mission press at Algiers that will be turning out millions of pages of Christian literature in these various languages, especially adapted to Gospel work among the Mohammedans.

One important line of work will be the distribution of the Bible. I am praying for a Gospel motor car, to be used for this work throughout the country, for Algiers has many places where the roads are excellent. Other lines of work will be mechanical industries and medical work, as well as schools and direct evangelistic work.

At Tunis, 250 miles east of Algiers, we also have made a beginning. This is a city of 200,000 people, one of the finest cities of Africa. The ruins of old Carthage are in the suhurbs. Here we have a missionary and his wife, who have given nine years to this work and have learned the Arabic and French languages. There is also another lady helper. We have opened an American Bible shop, and for the first time in the history of that country have secured authority to sell the Bible in the open streets. This Bible shop is the centre of daily meetings and discussions, which are exceedingly interesting. Then we have meeting places for the women and girls. We have succeeded in organizing an industrial school for girls, where we are allowed to teach them sewing on condition that an old Mohammedan woman should sit with them and see that nothing wrong was done. This last privilege was withdrawn, but we expect soon to have it again.

In both Algiers and Tunis we have several interesting native helpers. In the former city we have two native Kabylan women and also a converted Arab, who are very efficient in their work. In Tunis I have employed our first converted Mohammedan. He has been a faithful Christian for several years and is a fine fellow. We have great hopes of his usefulness. Associated with him in Tunis is a Jewish young man who was converted some years ago, and these two together are constantly doing evangelistic work in the shops and among the people. With their bicycles, they take long evangelistic trips in the country.

The providential features of all this work are many. One is the way in which we were led into it. The call from Paul to the Macedonians has not, in modern times, had a more definite illustration than this call which came to American Christians at that prayer meeting held in Rome, under the shadow of the Vatican, to go into Africa and open a mission. Another providential feature is the securing of these trained and competent people, who have had years of experience on the ground. The latest providential event has been the securing of Rev. Dr. Frease, who has labored for twenty years as a missionary in India and whom I have appointed as superintendent of what we call the "American Mission of North Africa."

Our opportunities for opening work in Morocco are also excellent and I have plans by which, in the near future, we shall have even better opportunities than in either of the places mentioned above. In Tripoli there is a large school, with an experienced missionary, who is anxious to transfer himself and his work to us.

In a broad sense, the importance of this movement is emphasized strongly by the fact that, from Egypt west to the Atlantic Ocean, a distance of more than 2,000 miles, there is no regularly organized church missionary society. Ours will be the first movement for Christianity on a large scale in giving the Gospel to the Mohammedans along the Mediterranean—that beautiful land, once the home of the larger part of the early Christian Church, where Cyprianus and Tertullian and Athanasius and St. Augustine, and many other great characters in the Christian Church of the early centuries, did their wonderful work for God.

[Bishop Hartzell's announcement of the appointment of the Rev. Edwin Field Frease, D.D., to the superintendency of the North African Missions of the M. E. Church is a most important one. Dr. Frease has had a long and successful experience in mission work in India. He was executive secretary and treasurer of the Interdenominational Relief Committee which had charge of the distribution of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD India Famine Fund, including the great cargoes which this journal sent to Bombay and Calcutta in the relief ships Quito and City of Everett. Dr. Frease's mission was in the Gujerat district, which is as large as Kansas and has a population of some 10,000,000, but his duties in connection with the famine relief work brought him into contact with practically all the Protestant missions in India, and his personal efforts and great ability contributed in a very large measure to the splendid success of that work (which saved hundreds of thousands of lives) and also of the wonderful orphanage work which followed as a sequel. In his own immediate mission field he has been phenomenally successful. In his twenty years' ministry the number of converts in Gujerat has risen to between 35,000 and 40,000. Bishop Foss and other high officials of the M. E. Church speak of him in the highest terms as a great missionary of unusual executive ability, and one whose work in India has been so signally blessed that his going to Morocco is full of promise for the future of that comparatively new mission field.]

More Than Her Money's Worth

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The Christmas issue and December 16 number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with Inside History of the White House and mounted pictures, have reached me, all in good order. I am much pleased with them. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I have always thought a paper of great value, because its contents inspire within me a desire to reach out and up to a higher plane of living. Therefore I know I have my money's equivalent and even more.

AN AMERICAN'S CHALET IN THE ALPS

By Rev. WM. CARTER, D.D., of New York

CHATEAU D'OEX stands well back from the road, and you must go up a winidng lane to reach it. The lane is narrow, and much frequented by Switzerland's chief product—cows. Cows have the right of way here, and are apt to insist upon it.

Yes, the cows are very important, and their owners treat them with deference and, indeed, with regard and affection. See those bells on each cow? They are elaborate and expensive bronze bells, each perfectly moulded, of beautiful design, and often bearing the owner's name in relief. The tuning of the bells is, too, a matter of great care, each one having its own particular tone. All being of large size, the sound would be most pleasing to the ear, if there were not quite so many of them.

That man with the velvet suit and what looks like a white "shirt waist" with "elbow sleeves," is taking his cows to market, and is dressed up for the occasion in the national peasant costume. This consists of velvet trousers, velvet zouave jacket, with puffed sleeves reaching only half way to the elbow, and underneath a white shirt waist with sleeves that do not go below the elbow. The woman, too, is in holiday dress, and is a brave sight. Glittering, jingling chains reach from the breast underneath the arms, in long, graceful loops, and are fastened behind, in the middle of the back. To crown all, there is a long, floating head-dress, half Swiss, half Spanish, but thoroughly characteristic in every case.

Here we are at our chalet gate. It's a sweet little garden that we have up here in the mountains, with cosmos and dahlias, nasturtiums and corn flower, petunias and roses, all growing in wildest profusion. Look a little more closely at the façade. There is a huge, overhanging roof, so common to all Swiss architecture, that projects some three feet over all the front of the house and forms a protection for the veranda below. The front itself is done in what we have copied and called "shingle style," but here the "shingles" are not much larger than a dollar, and so the house looks from the front as though it were done in mosaic, with its little yellow discs of wood overlaying one another. The windows are all shuttered with solid shutters, to keep out the bitter winds that sometimes sweep down from the mountains. The windows themselves are hinged on either side, the two halves meeting in a close joint that effectually keeps out the wind. The veranda runs to the left of the main doorway, and is screened with glass at one end, while lounging chairs and rugs and table make the place cozy and inviting.

Outside our chalet is all of wood. Inside, it is all wood, too—no lath and plaster, no paper on the walls, no patent ceilings of any kind, but above, below and on every side it is wood. The ceilings are beamed, the walls paneled, the doors and windows set in artistically so as to give a homelike effect. In the "salon," or drawing room, is a German piano in the corner, on which the eldest demoiselle of the family plays American airs, and on top is a violin on which the youngest fille scrapes a bow at times. When in the evening I pull down the electric light to a convenient angle and draw up my easy chair before the stove with my favorite author in hand, I forget for the time that America is four thousand miles away. The stove is made on the principle and style of a "self-cooker," not for beauty, but for economy of heat and fuel, for hard coal here is $14 a ton, soft coal $11, and wood that much a cord. You can build a roaring fire in the stove, but after that it will continue to give out heat that will comfortably warm the room and stay hot five or six hours after the fire has burned out. The real "head of the house" indeed says she has a fire started the night before for morning, and one in the morning started for use at night.

The maid is announcing that Le déjeuner est servi. How prim and fresh and clean that little waitress is, with her nobby little cap and frilled apron! She not only waits on table and answers the door, but makes all the beds, blacks the shoes, tends to all those twelve stoves, and still keeps herself looking neat and clean, finding time meanwhile to play with little Billie, the Czar of the household, in between times.

Berthe, our cuisinière, is a good cook and can make a great deal out of very little. We have had her six weeks now, and we have soup twice a day, and it really seems as though we had not had the same kind twice since she has been with us! Then her desserts! Here, for instance, to-day she has boiled chestnut pudding, with whipped cream. I never heard of it before and I doubt if you ever did, but take some! I know you will find it a dish fit for a king.

Now, if your hunger is satisfied, we will make a little tour of the house. Here, right off the dining room and making the last room across the front of the house, is the children's schoolroom, where the gouvernante teaches the children "the elements and principles of the French language" two or three hours a day, while we try to teach them the elements and principles of an English education the rest of the time. This thing of being four thousand miles away from your own school, and having to teach your children a regular school course for a year, makes one brush up on his arithmetic, his spelling, grammar and geography.

We have a few acres, with fruit trees and vegetables and grass plots, where, up to early October, we had our luncheon outdoors and could take our chairs and read in the sun while the children played around. The strange thing about the climate is, that though the thermometer goes down to thirty or forty degrees below zero, yet when the sun comes out so dry is the air that you can sit out without wraps and go coasting in shirt waists and "shirt sleeves," if you like.

We have modern improvements here—electric light, "steam heating" (a la the twelve stoves), bathrooms, with running water and toilet facilities, and last, but not least, the "elevator." The only trouble, however, is that the "elevator" is very old-fashioned, and you yourself have to supply the power.

You are shiveringly thinking at bed time, perhaps, of that cold bed you have to get into, but Louise has attended to that, and when you jump in and push your feet down in the warm clothes you almost jump out again as your feet touch something hotter than you ever expected to feel in this life, or the next. A Swiss "bed warmer," called here a bouillotte, beats rubber water-bags all hollow. It is a flat, oval, tin water-bottle, about two inches thick, with a screw-top in the middle of its upper surface, where the boiling water is poured in, the receptacle holding about two quarts. Carefully with your feet you put it to one side, and find it still warm in the morning, when you awake.

Good night! The mountain stream outside will sing you a lullaby all night long, and the majestic Rublihorn and Gummfluh, eight thousand feet above you, which you see yonder from your window, will stand as mighty barriers to protect you from the onslaught of any sudden storm. Indeed, if the mountains and the bouillotte could not do it, there is still the duvet that is piled on top of you, and that some people call derisively a "feather bed." Don't scorn it; it is made of the downiest down of the goose, and you would be foolish not to enjoy it when you have a chance, for it is guaranteed to keep out "the coldest cold that ever wind did blow." Your bath will be all ready for you in the morning, and your dressing room "piping" hot. So many comforts will you have indeed that I am afraid you will be envying us them all; but remember that the price you have to pay for them, though not much in this world's goods—far less, indeed, than for the plainest living in the "States"—is the price of isolation, separation and great loneliness of spirit, except when a welcome guest comes in, perchance, to stay with us a while.

A Street Scene in Chamouni, Switzerland

THE ICE PALACE AT SARANAC

IN a recent issue of this paper there was printed a picture of the beautiful ice palace at Montreal, Canada, which was made the centre of the festivities of the winter carnival in that favorite winter resort of Americans and people from the British Isles.

This year the town of Saranac, in the Adirondack Mountains, in New York State, was not outdone by its northern neighbor in the wonderful castle of glistening ice which capped the crest of a nearby hill. While not quite as high as the palace at Montreal, its projecting bastions and towers gave it the appearance of a feudal fortress of the Middle Ages which had suddenly been struck by a blizzard and covered with ice. It is now a thing of the past.

The Front of the Saranac Ice Palace

Both at Montreal and at Saranac the winter sports are of much the same character. There are long trips taken by those who like snow-shoeing and tobogganing on the crust of the mountain sides or on the carefully prepared chutes. The air is so dry at Saranac that people can be out and enjoy themselves at a temperature which would keep everybody indoors in any town along our Atlantic seaboard or at a lower altitude.

It strikes the visitor with a good deal of surprise to come upon this thriving, growing town in the very heart of the mountains, with all the advantages of a fair-sized city, after he has been traveling for hours beside mountain torrents and under the shadow of almost inaccessible peaks.

PROMINENT PEOPLE TALKED ABOUT

WILLIAM WILLETT, of London, has become one of the most talked-of men in England on account of his "Daylight Saving Bill," which is now before Parliament and has apparently a good chance of being passed. It has gone through the stage of second reading. He proposes that the clock shall be advanced one hour on the third Sunday of April each year and retarded one hour on the third Sunday in September of each year. In this way he calculates that 210 hours of daylight, that are now practically lost, would be saved. In London it would save two and one-half million pounds sterling in artificial light. The working day would commence earlier and close before darkness sets in. He claims that several hours of natural light are wasted before people begin business, and work prolonged to an unreasonable length of time after nightfall. When it came up, one hundred and thirty members of Parliament voted for a second reading, while ninety-four opposed.

Benjamin R. Barber, a young American, has been awarded one of the most coveted distinctions in the British empire—the Kaiser-i-Hind Medal—for public service in India. Mr. Barber is a Methodist and is secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association in Calcutta. On November 7 of last year Professor Barton, of the University of Chicago, who was visiting India, was to lecture in the student building on the subject of "Education." It was to be a very important occasion, and, to show the guest of the evening special honor, Sir Andrew Fraser, president of the local association, was to preside. Sir Andrew is one of the most distinguished men in India and Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. Mr. Barber received him and escorted him to the platform. As the young Y. M. C. A. secretary turned to allow the Governor to ascend the steps he received a sharp blow on the back of the head. Though half stunned, Mr. Barber grappled bravely with his assailant, who was endeavoring to pass him and shoot the Governor. Mr. Barber got his hand on the fanatic's revolver; the latter pulled the trigger and the hammer came down, cutting into the flesh of the secretary's hand. The desperado again got away and sprang at Sir Andrew, but before he could shoot he was again in the strong arms of Mr. Barber and his pistol was twisted from his grasp. On the platform, meanwhile, the Maharaj-Adhiraja of Bardwan, a loyal native prince, had thrown himself in front of Sir Andrew to shield him with his own body.

The police had rushed into the hall, and the would-he assassin was secured. Order was restored and the meeting proceeded as if nothing unusual had happened.

Recently, when the Viceroy of India held a formal investure to bestow honors on those who had served India and gained distinction in the military or civil service, Mr. Barber was asked to be present. First, several officials and native rulers were made knights or companions of the Order of the Star of India, and the brave Maharaj-Adhiraja of Bardwan received the badge of the Indian Order of Merit.

When Mr. Barber's name was called he came forward, bowed, and then the Viceroy pinned on his breast the Kaiser-i-Hind medal. The medal is of gold, one inch wide and three inches long. The ribbon by which it is attached to the coat is of blue silk. In the centre are the letters "E. R. I.," standing for Edward, Rex, Imperator. Kaiser-i-Hind means Emperor of India. Around the edge are the words "For Public Service in India."

Vice-Admiral Pascual Cervera, who played the most distinguished part on the Spanish side in the war of 1898, has just died at his home in Puerto Real, Spain. His bravery was undoubted and his dignified bearing after the destruction of his fleet off Santiago gained for him the respect and friendship of our naval officers. The admiral's full name and title were Pascual de Cervera y Topete, Conde de Jerez, Marquis de Santa Ana. He was born in Jerez, where his father was a man of great wealth. His mother was Maria, daughter of Count Porpete, who was related to the Spanish royal family. Young Cervera entered the Spanish Naval Academy at eighteen, and graduated in 1854. In 1859 he fought his first battle in a campaign against Morocco. Then he was sent on an expedition to China. For a while he was out of active service, being attached to the Spanish legation in Washington. During the ten years' war in Cuba Cervera commanded the fleet which blockaded the Cuban ports. While on this duty he was called home to become Secretary of the Navy.

When the war with the United States broke out Cervera was placed in command of a fleet intended to ravage the Atlantic coast. He knew that such a plan was out of the question and that they must act on the defensive, but the government ignored his protest.

He reached Cuba and entered the harbor of Santiago. His subsequent dash for liberty and the destruction of his entire fleet is known to every American. The admiral and other persons were held, first at Portsmouth, N. H., and then at Annapolis. He was shown much sympathy, and the admiral wrote before leaving: "I sail with a heart full of gratitude for the sympathy shown by the people of this country." He was tried by court-martial on his return to Spain, but honorably acquitted and made vice-admiral.

We are invited to a private home. Here three or four large frames are set up against the outside wall, under the projecting roof. On the ground is a tiny basin, with three shreds of colored wool. Several women are at work here with the threads, red, white and black. It takes them a month to make a little rug; such a small one costs about $2.40. Four women may take turns working on it. These women make the woolen threads themselves, and color these, buying the dyes in the town. Girls begin this work at fourteen. One man in Belgrade buys up all that they produce. In a year, a family may make twelve large carpets. They work only when they have leisure. The women carpet weavers are divided into two societies, and a commercial company then pays them by the day. In this way they are sure of a living, and of purchasers, instead of working for a pastime, as formerly. Occasionally an exposition of the carpet output is held at Belgrade. The annual output of the carpets here is estimated at 30,000 francs. Four or five women work on a carpet, and a big one may take ten months to weave and will cost $80 to $100. The more complicated the pattern, of course, the greater the expense. A woman begins working sometimes at the age of ten. She will clear an average of six cents a day! Servian families are poor, but they are averse to working out for strangers. They raise their own food, and usually make their own clothes.

Suddenly there is an interruption to our pleasant talk. The local Commissioner of Police is entering the house. He has been informed that a stranger has come to town and he wishes to know who this stranger might be. The stranger had been seen by two of their detectives, engaged in taking both photographs and notes in this town, which is one of the strongholds of Servia. The prefect and the general had been notified, and the stranger was being watched.

Of course the stranger in question was myself. A friend explained that the stranger was simply an American journalist, who had traveled all over Europe safely; had, in fact, been at the coronation of the Servian King.

The chief of police, hearing the explanation, sent a hack to the depot police and ordered them not to trouble us, should we go that way.

To return to the wedding. It was celebrated, first of all, in the church. Friends had gone to the home of the groom, accompanying him to that of the bride, where the parents gave her away. Thence all went to church, after which there would be dancing and feasting. Next morning friends would call and be hospitably entertained at the new home.

Through the influence of Germany, war has been averted in the Balkans, and Servia has been compelled to withdraw her claims. Russia, it is learned, was unwilling to acquiesce in Austria's annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, but Germany's influence at St. Petersburg carried the day. One report states that Germany practically gave an ultimatum to Russia and declared that German troops were massed on the Polish frontier and would march against Russia unless that power promptly supported Austria in the question at issue. The warning was effective, Russia promptly complied and the humiliation of Servia was complete. Great Britain, France and Italy have all united in advising Servia to give way to Austria and not precipitate a clash; but the Servians, as well as the Montenegrins and the whole population of the Balkan range, feel the submission of Servia to be a blow at their own freedom. Thus, with such intense dissatisfaction at the bottom of the present arrangement, the peace may not be of long duration.

TESTIMONIALS FROM PROMINENT MEN ON THE ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF ALL NATIONS

FOR the further information of our readers who are interested in our unprecedented History Offer — The Illustrated History of All Nations — we give the following testimonial letters from prominent men concerning this magnificent work:

Adlai E. Stevenson, Ex-Vice-President of the United States, says:

"The Library of Universal History is indeed a complete record of the human race. It should find a place in every library."

Wallace Radcliffe, D.D., Pastor Presbyterian Church, Washington, D.C., writes:

"The progress of civilization is well indicated throughout the volumes, and the main features admirably grouped in the closing of some of the volumes. The history is brought down to the most prominent events and figures of the present year. The tone is healthful, patriotic and in religious mention true and reverential. The style is compact, clear and graphic. The illustrations are superb. The maps deserve special mention."

Rev. W. C. Bitting, D.D., Pastor Baptist Church, New York, says:

"The Library of Universal History amply justifies its title. The fascinating story of mankind's beginnings and developments moves before us like a charming panorama, beautifully illustrated by surprisingly illuminating pictures. The attention paid to life invests the story with the interest of a novel, while the well-written narrative of fact becomes more absorbing than any creation of the imagination. The illustrations illustrate; many of them are rare. The historical maps so necessary to the understanding of a nation's career show the fluctuations of territory at a glance. They are more abundant than in any similar work with which I am acquainted. Every home would be richer with this work, no matter how many histories may supplement it. Every parent should put it within the reach of his children."

A Self-Constituted Critic

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE minister was in his study half way through the preparation of his next Sunday morning's sermon. There was a good deal of sickness in the congregation and he had made many calls during the week and had attended two funerals in outlying districts of the parish. The Rev. John Inglis was fifty years old and he had spent twenty-two years in the country church in which he had first been ordained and installed. To this village of Deepwater he had brought his bride, and in their little manse they had lived their quiet useful life, working faithfully for the good of the people, in the name of the Lord. Here their three children had been born. Olive, Marjorie and Edwin were now beyond their childhood, and only the second, Marjorie, was at home. Olive was living with an aunt in a distant city that she might study art, and Edwin was in his last year at a preparatory school. Marjorie had been delicate and had been taught at home by her parents. She was at eighteen a beautiful young girl, with hair of spun gold and eyes blue as the sky. Fortunately for himself, Mr. Inglis was not wholly dependent on his annual salary, and having private means amounting to a small independence he had been able to afford, in the manse and for his family, some luxuries that in the eyes of certain members of the congregation seemed extravagant.

Sermon-writing had not been easy that Friday morning, but at last, after several disappointing attempts at a beginning, the brain had summoned its energy and an illumination had come as the minister studied the text. He was a man of prayer, and no sermon of his was written without a petition that the Spirit would guide his pen. Yet the most consecrated Christian and the most devout pastor has his side of human weakness, and if anything could disturb the serene temper of John Inglis it was a needless interruption when he was in his study. His wife knew this, and as far as she could, Marjorie helping her, she kept visitors away between nine and twelve. However, a visitor had called who was insistent and refused to state her errand. She said she must see the minister himself, then and there, and Mrs. Inglis, softly opening the door, laid her hand gently on the forehead of her John. He looked up, and a little brusquely said, "Well, what is it?" softening the next instant, and adding, "Pardon me, dear. I suppose somebody wants me. I hope whatever the call is it can wait until the afternoon."

"It," replied Mrs. Inglis, "is Mrs. William Crump, and I have in vain tried to ascertain her errand and to put her off, but nothing will do except to let her see you at once."

"I will go down," said the minister. "That woman is a thorn in this parish. Things were much pleasanter before the Crumps came here."

"Hush, darling," said his wife. "I am afraid she will hear you. I left her planted in the hall at the foot of the stairs. She said she must see the minister in his study."

The minister resigned himself to the inevitable, and presently Mrs. Crump, large, florid and important, a woman who reminded one of a ship under full sail, made her impressive entrance. She had a deep resonant voice, and conveyed an idea of massive and ponderous strength. Her type was peculiarly offensive to a man who, like Mr. Inglis, objected to domineering women, and who had already had his troubles even in a rural parish with ladies who were disposed to sit on the box and drive.

"Good morning, Mrs. Crump," he said, rising and motioning her to a chair. "What can I do for you? I hope no one is ill in your home. I met your husband yesterday and he looked very happy."

"Ephraim Crump," said that gentleman's spouse, "is a person who never disturbs himself about anything so long as his dinner is good and his house is well kept. The weight of responsibility is on my shoulders. Ephraim takes no interest in the children's upbringing, and it is nothing to him that our Willie does not like your preaching, and that Agnes says you use too many illustrations."

The faintest shadow of a smile passed over the face of Mr. Inglis. Willie and Agnes, indeed! The latter was a pert child of twelve who had inherited a great deal of her mother's complacent vanity, and the former was a boy of fourteen, rather backward for his age. Neither of these children was sufficiently mature to pass judgment on the sermons of their pastor.

"I have noticed," replied the minister, "that Willie has not attended the Bible class regularly of late, and his teacher has regretted that when there

"'You ought to hear the truth from somebody,' said Mrs. Crump"

the boy has been inattentive. Agnes is hardly old enough as yet to be a censor. I am sorry, Mrs. Crump, that my work in the pulpit does not appear to you what it should be, and I want to do the best I can for all the dear children of the church; but I must preach the word that is given, and I have to consider the whole congregation, not merely two or three individuals."

"Well," answered Mrs. Crump, rising from her chair, "I told Ephraim that you ought to hear the truth from somebody. Ephraim said I would not have the nerve to tell you what I said to him, but I am not afraid of you or any one else. I think that your daughter Marjorie sets a bad example to the young girls of this parish by being so lazy and useless. So far as I can judge she does not assist her mother by working in the kitchen, and Mrs. Inglis has to keep help. Then she does not go to school and distracts the attention of the young people by singing frivolous songs at the guild meetings, instead of hymns. I do not approve of Marjorie."

This time Mr. Inglis did not smile. To tell the truth, he was frankly angry; for his pretty Marjorie was as the apple of his eye. Besides, he did not feel that any one had a right to interfere in or comment upon his household arrangements. Being a gentleman, he controlled himself, and simply observed to Mrs. Crump, who looked very like a turkey with plumage spread, "I must ask you to excuse me. I cannot discuss Marjorie with any one, and our home affairs are not the concern of anybody in the congregation. Good morning." And opening the door he bowed the lady out.

Mrs. Inglis was not surprised when a half hour later her husband emerged from the study and sought her in the living room. She could always sooth him if he were ruffled, and she only laughed merrily when he told her what Mrs. Crump had said about Marjorie. She had divined before this that some of the good sisters disapproved of her methods in training her daughter, and she knew, too, that Marjorie Inglis was very much the prettiest girl in the countryside. What did exasperate her was the fact that Mrs. Crump found fault with the sermons. "John," she said, "did it ever occur to you that twenty-two years is a very long pastorate in these days? You have declined several calls in the past, because you thought your duty was here. Now if another comes wouldn't you imagine there was an intimation that you should find another field, John?"

"Calls do not multiply, Emily, when a man is fifty. There are so many younger men who are stepping into the arena that the middle-aged or elderly minister cannot hope for promotion."

"Fiddlesticks, John!" said Mrs. Inglis, irreverently. "You are in the meridian of your years. You never preached so well and you never were so fit to do the Lord's work as now, but you are not obliged to think of making a change on account of Mrs. Crump. Just go back and finish your sermon. After dinner I'll drive with you when you go to visit Nellie Richards, who, poor child, is worse and longing to see you. Then I'll unfold a plan I have in mind."

The plan was simply this. Mrs. Inglis had for some time wanted her husband to drop work for a whole year and take a greatly needed rest. They were waiting for an emergency that was always spoken of as Uncle Robert's legacy. She proposed that Mr. Inglis should resign and with her and the children go across the ocean to the highlands of Scotland, and there spend several months. They could then determine their future wanderings, and she felt assured that when they returned to their native land other work would open for him. Not one conversation but at least a half dozen were necessary before they reached a decision; but at last the husband yielded his assent.

To leave Deepwater required a wrench, but Mr. Inglis knew the hearts of most of his people, and realized that a new voice might bring them the old message with greater effect than his could do.

As for Mrs. Crump, she was more than ever aghast when she discovered that after his resignation Mr. Inglis intended to take his family to Europe. "Purple and fine linen!" she was heard to mutter. "Worldly, worldly. Minister's folks should be humble. Well," she said, finally, "I trust the next minister will not be so learned as Mr. Inglis, and the next minister's wife not so fashionable as Mrs. Inglis." Ephraim, however, for once asserted himself. "Miranda," he said, tersely, "we'll never again have a better preacher or a better friend in Deepwater than the man that's going away. When the next minister comes, if I can manage it, I'll prevent your talking so much. The thing you've got to learn, my dear, is how to mind your own business."

The Gospel in the Island World

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE island world is vast; it is said to contain an area of three million seven hundred thousand square miles, and over seven millions of people. Surely the Lord Jesus meant that saving truth should reach these people when he gave the command to his apostles to go into all the world and preach the Gospel. It is most interesting to read in prophecy concerning this: "The isles shall wait for me, and on mine arm shall they trust" (Isa. 51:5). "These shall lift up their voice; they shall shout; for the majesty of Jehovah they cry aloud from the sea" (Isa. 24:14).

We now have the opportunity to study by whom the Gospel was first carried to island people. There is in the Mediterranean Sea an island called Cyprus. It is about one hundred and fifty miles long, and from fifty to sixty miles wide. It lies off the coast of Syria and Asia Minor. Running through the centre of it is a chain of mountains, which give to the island a blue, hazy appearance as one sails by. How eagerly it was watched by the pilgrims of the Jerusalem cruise in 1904, who, with Bibles in hand, read concerning the preaching of the Gospel there!

The church at Antioch, in Syria, was filled with the missionary spirit; the island of Cyprus was less than one hundred miles over sea from Antioch, and there was a desire on the part of the Christians in Antioch to send the Gospel to the inhabitants of Cyprus. This desire probably originated with Barnabas, who was a native of Cyprus and who for more than two years had been preaching to Jews in Antioch, having come there from Jerusalem. Other Christian teachers had been developed in the church at Antioch: Simeon called Niger, and Lucius of Cyrene, and Manaen; and Barnabas had brought the great Saul from Tarsus to be his coadjutor.

The question arose, who among these should be sent on the Gospel errand to Cyprus? It was a momentous question, and while they were considering it they prayed and fasted. God graciously heard and answered them, and said through the Holy Spirit, possibly by tongues of fire resting upon the heads of the chosen ones, "Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them." And then, in a most solemn manner, they continued in fasting and prayer, and laid their hands upon the heads of Barnabas and Saul, consecrating them to the work, and then bade them godspeed. Going with them, but only for a brief time, was John Mark, the cousin of Barnabas.

Antioch was not directly on the seacoast, but on the river Orontes, sixteen miles from the sea, on which Barnabas and Saul passed in a small boat until they came to the seaport, Seleucia; there they shipped for Cyprus. They entered Cyprus at the port of Salamis, and probably passing through many of the seventeen cities on the island and preaching the Gospel in them, they came at length to Paphos, the capital and seaport on the west coast. "From Salamis to Paphos" described the length of the island. We are not told of what they experienced on this journey until they came to Paphos. Let us hope that many converts were made by the way. The two most prominent people in Paphos were the governor, Sergius Paulus, and Elymas, the sorcerer, sometimes called Bar Jesus, a very common name among Jews, meaning son of Joshua. It is said that Sergius Paulus was a man of understanding and called for Barnabas and Saul to come to him and talk concerning the Word of God. But Elymas withstood the governor, and tried to dissuade him from the teachings of Barnabas and Saul. He stood like a wicked spirit incarnate contending for the soul of Sergius Paulus. Indeed, Saul addressed him as "Thou son of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness." And then Saul called upon God to strike him with blindness for a season. And immediately he became blind, and had to be led away. Then Sergius Paulus was glad to listen to the teaching of Barnabas and Saul, and he was much astonished at what he had seen and heard, and believed in the Lord—the first island governor convert. But how many there have been since! And Cyprus has the distinction of being the first island in the world to receive the Gospel. And Barnabas and Saul must be acknowledged as the first missionaries to the island world. Another ship's journey carried them away from Cyprus to the mainland in Asia Minor, where they continued the preaching of the Gospel. Two other islands in the Mediterranean Sea, Crete and Melita, were given the Gospel message by Saul, now called "Paul."

The Gospel Ships

What a fleet of them there would be if those which have been in service and those that are now plying in many parts of the world could be gathered together! There is the old Duff, which sailed from London more than one hundred years ago. There is the old Morning Star, which was built many years since by the children in the Congregational Sunday Schools of the United States. Morning Star No. 2 is coming in sight, now Morning Star No. 3. There is the Day Spring, built by gifts of the children of Australia. There is the Hiram Bingham No. 1, No. 2. We are told that its cargo is made up of Bibles to carry to the islands in the South Seas. How inspiring to look at such a fleet! Look at that tiny one! What a foreign look it has! We read "Fukuin Maru"—"Ship of the Good News." It is a Gospel ship that, for a few years, has been moving about from island to island of the Inland Sea of Japan. It was the gift of Mr. Allan, of Glasgow. Here are three rules under which the ship sails, to prevent haphazard work:

1. The ship shall never undertake work in any place where any denomination has any permanent work.

2. The ship shall go to every village on every island, and persist in Christian effort until, by general consent of the people, the vessel and its message are welcome.

3. It shall always be borne in mind that the Gospel is for all men, irrespective of class distinction. The ship travels over three thousand miles a year, carrying an evangelist who gives sermons, stereopticon lectures, and even private talks, as the little vessel stops at island after island. A tent is carried, which can be spread when large meetings are to be held. As the Fukuin Maru lies at anchor, or passes through the channels, she is seen and well known by the people in the villages, and in the fields and woods on the mountain side. Another Japanese vessel follows, smaller than the first. It is the Dai Ni Fukuin Maru. It is engaged in the distribution of Bibles in the track of the Fukuin Maru. The master of this small craft is not only a Bible seller, but he leads young and old to an appreciation of the Book he so deeply loves. Still the fleet of Gospel ships is passing: Harmony No. 1, No. 2, No. 3, No. 4, built by the Moravians. And there is The Southern Cross, named for the beautiful constellation seen in the heavens south of the

The lamp-chimney that lasts is always cheaper, at several times the price, than the one that breaks without an excuse. MACBETH lamp-chimneys last so long that they would have to cost five times what they do before the common kind would be the more economical. As a matter of fact, MACBETH lamp-chimneys cost only a few cents apiece more than the poorest, and they never break from heat, and they give better light.

My Lamp-Chimney Book insures getting the right chimney for any burner, and gives suggestions about lamps, chimneys, wicks, oils, and tells how to keep lamps in order. I gladly mail it, free, to anyone who writes for it. Address equator. Its weather-worn appearance tells of its many journeys among the islands of the Southern Sea. Another small craft is coming in view; it is the mission boat El Heraldo Cristiano, for Gospel work in the Philippines. We feel impelled to give it a special salute, because it is our very own boat. In the offing are innumerable vessels of the Gospel fleet, too distant for us to see their names and even to be counted.

And here we have a close view of one of the crews, a native crew of the Dayspring in 1870. There are converts from the cannibals of the New Hebrides Islands. John Geddie was the first missionary to work in Anciteum, one of the New Hebrides group. He gave many years of faithful service, and when he died a tablet was set up over his grave by the natives, which bore this testimony: "When he landed, in 1848, there were no Christians here; and when he left, in 1872, there were no heathens."

The Conquest of the Cross in the Island World

Barnabas and Saul, as they did their Gospel work on the island of Cyprus, had no vision of what the work thus begun would result in among the people of other islands. They saw not Hawaii, Fiji, New Guinea, Australia, New Zealand, Oceanica. They knew not that on hundreds of islands every vestige of heathenism would be swept away by Christianity.

Tahiti, in the Society Island group, was visited by four missionaries, who sailed thither from London on The Duff in 1796. They found the people most cruel, especially to children, whom they strung on spears like beads. The Tahitians worshiped hideous wooden figures, cut out of logs. For eleven years the missionaries worked without result and left the field. The London Missionary Society was about to abandon the work there when a clergyman proposed, instead, a season of prayer and letters of encouragement. The ship bearing these letters to Tahiti, in 1813, passed another ship that was carrying to England a cargo of idols, abandoned by the Tahitians, and with the wonderful news that the Gospel had triumphed in Tahiti. It was brought about by the efforts of two native servants, who had been employed in the families of the missionaries.

For many years the Christians on Tahiti have been giving oil and eggs and cocoanuts, and anything else they have, to help the missionaries take the Gospel to the people of other islands.

On the 25th of December, 1814, the Rev. S. Marsden preached his first sermon in the Bay of Islands, where now a simple Celtic cross marks the memorable spot.

But I wonder whether you know in what part of the world the Bay of Islands is?

Please search your map of New Zealand, and you will find it in the extreme northeast, a specially fine bay, possessing some lovely islands.

Considerably before New Zealand had been ceded to the British crown, the Maoris, its native inhabitants, speaking their own distinct language, and governed by their own warrior chiefs, were the most savage of all the Polynesian, or South Sea tribes.

Marvelous the change!

On that eventful Christmas, ninety-three years ago, God's courageous servant brought those heathen people "good tidings of great joy." Then missionary after missionary followed, and at this present time, by the quickening Spirit's gracious influences, that handful of corn upon the top of New Zealand's beautiful mountains shakes like Lebanon!

Quite recently an ordained Maori, the Rev. H. M. Ruarangi, gave a delightful address, which contained a striking illustrative incident.

"When I hear the question," said Mr. Ruarangi, "'What has Christianity done for the Maoris?' it reminds me of this story: A foreign vessel had been wrecked off our coasts, but the crew swam ashore, and saved themselves. Knowing, however, that the Maoris had been cannibals, they feared being roasted alive.

"Slowly and cautiously they journeyed inland, and as, on reaching the summit of a neighboring hill, they saw just on the other side a Maori settlement their knees shook under them with very fright.

"Suddenly they noticed towering conspicuously among the buildings a Christian church. How thankful they were! Perfectly confident of safety, they hastened down to the village, where they received a truly hospitable welcome."

The Fiji Islands were once the most cruel spot on earth. Mothers rubbed pieces of human flesh over the lips of their babies to give them a taste for blood; husbands killed and ate their own wives. Once one hundred fishermen were murdered, and their bodies were carried to the ovens at Bau. Sometimes victims were cut up alive before being put into the ovens. Two chiefs had a record of nearly nine hundred people whom they had eaten. Men were buried alive, holding up the posts of the chiefs' houses. But what a transformation the Gospel has wrought! When we visited there in 1907 we were told that there were now about ninety thousand Fijians, ten thousand of whom are Roman Catholics and eighty thousand are adherents of the Wesleyan Methodist Church. The Fijian Islands were entered in 1835 by two Wesleyan missionaries. Fiji may now be said to be one of the most Christian communities in the world. No need of locks or doors, we were told; and the observance of the Sabbath is almost perfect. The native constabulary, arrayed in blue blouses and white skirts, deeply pointed around the bottom, did not appear to be needed.

Bible Puzzles

IN A CERTAIN refined and religious home, many years ago, the numerous family used to gather before the open fire as the twilight drew on, and one would begin, "I have a character." Instantly young voices would chirp:

"Is it a man or a woman?"

"It is a woman."

"In what age did she live?"

Now, the Bible times were divided for this family into patriarchal, the judges' times, the kings' times, the prophetic and the New Testament times. The answer came: "New Testament."

"Was she a good woman?" "Yes."

"Did she know Christ?" "Yes."

"Was she his mother?" "No."

"His mother's cousin?" "No."

Five or six other questions—then the crucial one: "Was she cumbered with much serving?" "Yes."

Then a general shout of "Martha," and the one who had guessed rightly gave out a new character.

Now this was a simple game, though sometimes shrewd old grandfather or keen Aunt Tabitha would select a character which so baffled the group that it would run over from one evening to another, but the historical and biographical knowledge gained by all was really considerable. There was never irreverence and everyone enjoyed the hour. All the children of that family look back upon it now with tenderest pleasure.

The Little Doctor

A Serial Story Written for "The Christian Herald"

By AGNES LOWE ELLIS

DURING a conversation between Mr. Douglas and Dudley it was decided that the latter should return to the hotel, and call the next day. They would not risk the excitement which the revelation would cause the poor father. As early as possible the next morning, Mr. Douglas would gently prepare his friend for the happiness in store for him, when the son and father, so long strangers to each other, would be brought face to face.

Only waiting to write the telegram for George, Dudley returned to the hotel and, in the gladness of his heart, told Mr. MacDonald his story.

That warm-hearted gentleman at once planned for a visit from Dudley and his father to his Highland home, and would take no denial.

Dudley promised to urge his father to go, and then retired to his room to spend a wakeful but happy night. "If only George were here to talk to me!" he thought continually.

The meeting between the father and son was a touching one; and when, after a time, Mr. Douglas and his wife entered the room, fearful for the effect of the excitement upon their guest, they found him sitting quietly upon a sofa beside his son, holding his hand as if he would never let him go again. Deep thankfulness seemed to lift him above the weakness of the body. He spoke of his wife, and delighted in noticing this and that mark of resemblance to her in his son; the eyes, the voice, the turn of the head, were all so like his beloved Nellie.

He rejoiced to hear of the kind adopted parent to whom Dudley owed so much, and who, he was assured, would gladly welcome him to her home.

When Dudley proposed the tour to the Highlands, his father gladly consented; and in the evening, after dinner, he returned to the hotel to arrange for their departure.

The journey was a great pleasure, as Mr. MacDonald had insisted that Mr. and Mrs. Douglas should join the party. The climate proved to be so invigorating that for some time after they returned home, Dudley lingered, feeling it a duty to devote his time to his father for many days to come. They took up their abode before long at a hotel near the MacDonalds, and the days and weeks flew by as if on wings. Then Dudley received a letter from George in which he learned of the death of his patient and the trust left for him, and then wrote a note in reply, telling of the great blessing that had come to his life.

Before this letter reached America, Squire Danforth and Marian arrived at New York. As soon as possible Aunt Phœbe delivered to Marian the strange looking missive which she had been keeping for her. This was done in the presence of her father, who immediately said, "Let me open it, Marian."

A look of startled wonder on his face caused Marian to ask, "What is it, father?"

With an effort he replied, "Let me keep this for the present, and in good time I will explain its contents to you. I know from its appearance what is in it. It is a business matter, my dear."

After resting a few days, he set sail for Europe, but not until George had asked and received permission to wed his beautiful Marian, who gladly gave herself to him.

CHAPTER XXV

THE wedding was to be in June and in order to have everything in readiness for the occasion, the party of six, Mrs. Hunter, Mrs. Langdon, Marian, Lily, George and Donald, left soon for Branksome.

The first person they recognized on alighting from the train was Jack Green, who, having heard of their expected arrival, had put in an appearance at the station a full hour before they were due, to see, as he said, "if he couldn't lend a hand in getting their traps loaded up."

Mrs. Langdon insisted on having the whole party spend the first evening with Marian and her at their home, saying she had sent a message the day before, to have dinner prepared for six. They yielded to her urgent entreaties, although Marian and Lily had planned a long drive and quiet chat together for the evening.

The sun was just casting its last beautiful shadows over hill and dale. The trees in their new spring attire, the grassy carpet underneath them dotted here and there with anemones and forget-me-nots, all seemed to smile a welcome to the young girl. Her eyes glistened in tearful gratitude as she realized the changes that had come into her life during the year; and yet, could she have foreseen the blessings yet in store for her, she would have felt that "the half had not been told her."

After dinner George spoke of the letter which he had received from Dudley just before leaving New York—the letter which had been first entrusted to George by Dudley's Spanish patient, in which the mysteries of Dudley's childhood were made clear—and told the family all of the strange news contained therein.

Great surprise and excitement were caused by his disclosures. They all rejoiced with Dudley, and planned for the comfort of the poor father, who had been so grievously wronged and had suffered so bitterly. Marian even wept in sympathetic joy; and long after Mrs. Hunter and her family had gone home, she sat in a dream, dwelling in memory on some of the words uttered just before Squire Danforth's departure for Europe.

During their sojourn in Mexico, he had repeated in substance the same words.

"Marian, child, I have not told you everything I might have done about your early childhood and your dear mother. Soon, very soon, I shall tell you all you will want to know. You will not blame me that I have hidden anything from you for your good, will you?"

Always her answer had been, "Why, certainly not, papa. I trust your judgment fully." But now a strange longing to know what he could mean took possession of her, and as Mrs. Langdon was as little inclined to sleep as herself, they talked far into the night.

The month of May was drawing to a close, when one morning Jack Green appeared and triumphantly held out a letter to Marian, saying that as the "stamp had the queen's head on it, he reckoned the letter was from the Squire and he was mighty glad he had got safe to t'other side."

Marian received it joyfully; and, giving Aunt Phœbe a note which was inclosed for her, she sought a favorite seat under an old forest tree, and began its perusal. Hour after hour flew by, and at last Aunt Phœbe, who had anxiously searched the whole house in vain for her, found her, and noted on her face the marks of deep emotion. Tears and smiles were striving for the mastery with her, and as

"COFFEE DOESN'T HURT ME"

Tales That Are Told.

"I was one of the kind who wouldn't believe that coffee was hurting me," says a N. Y. woman. "You just couldn't convince me its use was connected with the heart and stomach troubles I suffered from most of the time.

"My trouble finally got so bad I had to live on milk and toast almost entirely for three or four years. Still I loved the coffee and wouldn't believe it could do such damage.

"What I needed was to quit coffee and take nourishment in such form as my stomach could digest.

"I had read much about Postum, but never thought it would fit my case until one day I decided to quit coffee and give it a trial and make sure about it. So I got a package and carefully followed the directions.

"Soon I began to get better and was able to eat carefully selected foods without the aid of pepsin or other digestants and it was not long before I was really a new woman physically.

"Now I am healthy and sound, can eat anything and everything that comes along and know this wonderful change is all due to my having quit coffee and got the nourishment I needed through this delicious Postum.

"My wonder is why everyone don't give up the old coffee and the troubles that go with it and build themselves up as I have done with Postum."

Easy to prove by 10 days trial of Postum in place of coffee. The reward is big.

"There's a Reason."

THE LITTLE DOCTOR

she quietly leaned her head on Aunt Phœbe's shoulder, the good soul said:

"Dear child, I have so wished to tell you part of this long ago—this wonderful news about your father and mother, which James tells me he has now communicated to you—but this about Dr. Verner seems too strange to be true." And in very excess of joy, they wept in each other's arms.

Squire Danforth's letter was as follows:

"LOCH EARN HEAD, May 15, 18—

"MY DEAR MARIAN:

"I am staying at a lovely place in the Highlands, in company with Dudley and his father. I know that ere this you have heard from George the wonderful news about Dudley.

"We are like three happy schoolboys here together.

"I have, you will think, my dear child, been a good deal of a coward in regard to you; but, believe me, I sought your good, and waited to be sure of my ground before I made the following revelations.

"You have always been as a dear daughter to me, and, indeed, you really belonged to me by right of gift from your mother, who was my dear sister Nellie.

"Thinking I had found traces of your long lost father, I waited to be sure, before giving up my claim upon you; and now I have found him, your own father, although I shall still claim you as my child, too.

"Nellie married a young Spanish gentleman, whom she met while in Scotland. They loved each other dearly. For a time they lived on that old plantation in Mexico. She went as a bride to 'Sac A-Kal,' but soon her husband took her to visit relatives in Spain, where he had large possessions.

"There, you and a twin brother were born, but after a time the baby boy was reported to have sickened and died.

"Your mother was too ill to see the child, and her husband was absent from home for a few weeks at the time. The poor mother grieved sorely at her son's loss. Some months later, she and her husband went to Scotland, where, business interests calling him to Spain, he left her with relatives. A letter written by the feeble hand of my dying sister summoned me to her side. I arrived just in time to receive her dying instructions in regard to the infant committed to my care. A cruel letter led her to believe her husband had been killed in a railroad accident, and the shock had hastened her end. Soon after her death, I received a letter purporting to come from your father, in which I was told that he had never really loved his wife, and now had no further interest in the child. He had wanted, while living, he said, to have his wife think him dead.

"How I hated him! And during the first years of your life, while you were in the hands of a faithful nurse and kind relatives, I traveled about, seeking in vain to find him.

"Dr. Verner recalled his face so strangely to me, that I had a positive dislike to him for a time, until his fine character overcame my prejudices. Accidentally, I was led during our tour in Scotland to the asylum, where, confined as a lunatic, I found the man for whom I had so long been searching.

"Now I know that he was unjustly and cruelly confined, and reported to be dead, in order that large estates should revert to a cousin of his.

"The villain at whose instigation these brutalities were perpetrated is now dead, and in the agony of his last moments persuaded his accomplice to reveal the crime. By accident, in New York City, a sight of Dudley Verner's face led in part to the confirmation of my hopes and fears. The infant boy was not dead, but having been adopted by a noble man and woman, grew up to be a good and useful man.

"We have known him as Dudley Verner, but I now know him as your twin brother and my dear nephew; so you see, my dear, you have found a father and brother; Dudley, a father and sister; and the poor man, whose life we have almost despaired of since I came here, through the nervous excitement brought on by excess of joy, is the happy father of two precious children.

"Mrs. Hunter, who, as Dora Bynan, was a dear friend of Nellie's and mine, but who, through a cruel mistake, I supposed for years to be dead, is very dear to me. As soon as you receive this, go to her. She has promised that as soon as you and George are settled in New York, she will come to gladden my heart and home. Remember, though, dear Marian, that beautiful 'Paradise,' named in memory of the dear old Scotch parsonage grounds, will always be your home, too.

"God bless you, my dear child. We expect to leave this place for America in a week. With fond love,

"Your uncle,

"JAMES DANFORTH."

Marian, overcome by her emotions, sought Mrs. Hunter at once, in the privacy of her own room, and sobbed out her full heart in a mother's loving arms. When they joined the family circle, they were all quietly happy, with hearts almost too full for utterance.

At once, preparations were made for the reception of the travelers, and on the day when a telegram sent from Glasgow had led them to believe that they might be expected, a message came from George in New York, that the steamer had arrived.

The glad yet trying meeting was over at last, and no home in America held happier hearts than those that were beating in sympathy in the spacious parlor of the Danforth mansion that morning. It was observed that Dudley seemed almost as glad to meet Lily again, as to greet his newfound sister. This was joyously remarked by Mrs. Hunter, and by all—not least, apparently, by Lily herself. In June, amid a profusion of fragrant bloom and cheered by the warble of the birds, in a melodious wedding chorus, George and Marian were married.

They departed after a merry wedding breakfast, for a month's stay at the seaside, before taking up their abode in an elegant New York mansion, which was only a few doors away from the beautiful home of Dudley and his father and Donald Fraser.

In the early autumn, Squire Danforth was united in marriage to his Theodora, his "Gift of God."

THE END

FOR MY OWN

SWEET Lover of the children!
Thy love was but a dream,
I knew it not, till little eyes
With love began to gleam.
O Master! on Thy gentle breast
Teach Thou my children Love is best.

Sweet Lover of the children!
Thy tears were mystery,
Until a saddened little face
Looked pleadingly at me.
O Master! with Thy mighty arm
Keep Thou my dear ones from the Harm.

Sweet Lover of the children!
Thy joy was all unknown,
Until the day when little hearts
Were resting on my own.
O Master! teach them, lest they fall,
That Love, alone, is all in all.

Trained Nurses on Our Warships

THE ghastly horror of the old naval cockpit has long been merely a memory. Even with all the modern medical and surgical improvements the lot of the unfortunate sailor who is stricken in battle aboard ship is not an enviable one. It is now proposed to train a corps of men for service as nurses on our warships, who will know how to give first aid to the injured, to attend to the wants of the wounded and act generally under the supervision of the ship's surgeon in time of battle.

The men who are to compose the corps of naval nurses enlist especially for that duty, although they will not be exempt from other work aboard ship. Their pay will be higher than the ordinary jackies', and promotion in the nurse service will be possible until a substantial wage is earned. Training will be thorough and along various useful lines. First of all, the men are drilled thoroughly in the duties of a nurse to the wounded. They are given a complete course of instruction in first aid and in the method of carrying a stricken man below during an action.

At the Naval Hospital in Philadelphia a corps of these nurse "jackies" is now being trained for service aboard ship. It is a training that differs in many respects from that given to the military ambulance man, for conditions at sea are very different from those that confront a man whose work it is to look after the injured in a land battle. The sailor nurse is trained in the method of carrying a wounded man below without assistance from a second man. There is a suggestion of jiu jitsu about the single manner of carrying a wounded man. His hands are grasped, and he is raised over the back of the carrier, the latter stooping as he raises his burden, and at last holding him over his shoulders.

The nurses are also taught stretcher work, the improvising of stretchers from coats in emergency, and the bandaging of wounds and improvisation of splints. A rifle and a bayonet are used as splints if there is nothing better at hand. They are used by the teachers of the naval nurses to illustrate the manner in which a broken limb should be braced, until better service can be rendered to the wounded man. If a man be stricken in a turret, he is as likely as not to be dead before he can be got to the surgeon's hands unless prompt aid is rendered, for wounds inflicted by the missiles in use in naval warfare to-day do not leave much chance for life. But while the naval nurse would not be sufficiently skilled to render expert surgical assistance he can be a life-saver through ready attention the instant the man falls.

These naval nurses will be to the ship's crew what the Red Cross men are to the soldiers. They will be in the fight to help the wounded and render instant service at the moment a man falls. They will be uniformed like ordinary "jackies." They will be part of the crew, and not privileged characters in any way, with their duties on board ship, just as other sailors have; only when their services as nurses are required will they assume this character. When that time comes, those services will be imperatively needed. In future fights in which our warships take part, if the odds are against us, and our "jackies" fall in numbers, the value of this new corps of naval nurses will be amply impressed upon the nation.

—DR ALEXANDER R. MERRIAM, professor of sociology in Harvard Theological Seminary, and fifteen students from that institution visited the Bowery Mission Bread Line one night lately. They were deeply interested in the unfortunate men and their condition.

—THE SUDDEN DEATH OF REV. C. O. MOULTON, superintendent of the Christian Mission in the West Indies and South America, has left his wife and three children unprovided for. All of the American missionaries resigned from the mission immediately after the death of Mr. Moulton.

—IDA REED, well known as a hymn writer and the author of the famous hymn, "I Belong to the King," is an invalid at Philippi, W. Va. She is very poor, and the closing years of her life are a hard struggle. Miss Reed can he addressed care of Rev. A. D. Craig, pastor M. E. Church, Philippi, W. Va.

—POCATELLO, IDAHO, has had a notable revival, conducted by Evangelist Hermiston. All denominations (Presbyterian, Episcopal, Baptist, Methodist Episcopal and Congregational) have united in the work. Many conversions are reported. One notable case is that of a well-known sceptic.

—A. MURATA, a Korean student at Tokyo, went to the war against Russia, distinguished himself and won medals and a lieutenant's rank. Then he was converted to Christianity. He married the daughter of a Buddhist priest, whose parents disowned her. Murata is now preaching in Pyeng-Yang, where he has organized a prosperous and growing church. Prince Ito, the Japanese Resident-General, recently gave him $2,500 as a donation to his work.

—INDUSTRIAL FARMS and hospitals for the reclamation of confirmed inebriates are the latest remedy proposed by the New York State Board of Charities. The battle against drunkenness is to be waged on scientific principles. It is proposed to have a Board of Inebriety, in full charge of the new system. Persons arrested for public intoxication, and who cannot show at least a clean record of one year, may be committed to these farms for from six to twelve months. It is claimed that such a system would eliminate the "rounder," diminish crime and save much of the expense in courts and hospitals now necessitated in handling the enormous number of drunken cases that come up in a year.

What Will You Give To Be Well

I CANNOT tell you how happy I am that I have been able to bring health and strength to 30,000 women in the past six years. Just think! this means a whole city. It is to my thorough study of anatomy, physiology and health principles, and to my 12 years' personal experience before I began my instructions by mail, that I attribute my marvelous success. It would do your heart good to read the reports from my pupils—and I have done all this by simply studying Nature's laws adapted to the correction of each individual difficulty. If vital organs or nerve centers are weak, I strengthen them so that each organ does its work.

I want to help every woman to be perfectly, gloriously well, with that sweet, personal loveliness which health and a wholesome, graceful body gives—a cultured, self-reliant woman with a definite purpose, full of the health and vivacity which makes you

A Better Wife
A Rested Mother
A Sweeter Sweetheart

To Have Good Figure, Vibrant Health, Rested Nerves?

I bring each pupil to symmetrical proportions and I teach her to stand and to walk in an attitude which bespeaks culture and refinement. A good figure, gracefully carried, means more than a pretty face. Nature's rosy cheeks are more beautiful than paint or powder. I help you to

Arise to Your Best!

The day for drugging the system has passed. In the privacy of your own room, I strengthen the muscles and nerves of the vital organs, lungs and heart and start your blood to circulating as it did when you were a child. I teach you to breathe so that the blood is fully purified.

You Can Be Well Without Drugs

And the vital strength gained by a forceful circulation relieves you of such chronic ailments as

Constipation Dullness
Torpid Liver Irritability
Indigestion Nervousness
Rheumatism Sleeplessness
Weaknesses Weak Nerves
Catarrh

by strengthening whatever organs or nerves are weak.

I wish I could put sufficient emphasis into these words to make you realize that you do not need to be ill, but that you can be a buoyant, vivacious, attractive woman in return for just a few minutes' care each day in your own home.

Individual Instruction—I give each pupil the individual, confidential treatment which her case demands. My information and advice are entirely free.

Too Fleshy? You can easily remove the fat and it will stay removed. I have reduced 15,000 women.

One pupil writes me:

"Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I feel so well I want to shout! I never get out of breath now.

"When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all so easy, I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

Too Thin? I may need to strengthen your stomach, intestines and nerves first. A pupil who was thin, writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman."

"My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion any more, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel so well all the time."

A CORSET IS NOT NEEDED FOR A GOOD FIGURE

Write me today telling me your faults in health or figure, and I will cheerfully tell you whether I can help you. I never treat a patient I cannot help. If I cannot help you I will refer you to the help you need.

Send me 10 cents for instructive booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly.

SAPOLIO

THE DEACONESS' VISIT

By LUCY RIDER MEYER

Principal, Deaconess Training School, Chicago

SISTER ELSPETH, the deaconess, paused before the door of what appeared to be an empty house. She knocked quietly, then turned the handle and entered. Broken panes of glass, mended with paper, and pieces of board were in the window frame. Some dry goods boxes against the wall formed a rude couch. A young woman, loathsome with disease, lay covered with a ragged coat. How tainted the air! How offensive the sufferer! She could not bring herself to go near her.

"Shall I read a little from the Bible?" said she. "No, thank you, I'll not sit down. I will stand here, near the door."

She opened her Bible: "All we, like sheep, have gone astray: we have turned every one to his own way, and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all."

"Stop! Don't read any more!" interrupted the woman; "'cos it ain't true. There's no pity for an outcast like me. You wouldn't come near me—you, the servant of the holy Jesus. Go 'way! Your message is not true. I don't believe a word of it. Like servant, like Master!"

The visitor's eyes grew suddenly moist. She was getting a glimpse of her own heart, and saw there not so much pity for the sinner as horror of her sin. Was it the shrill voice of the woman and the fire in her eyes that gave her the larger vision? Suddenly she understood that, though in this life they were far apart, yet in their need of a Saviour they were sisters.

"Oh, no, poor girl! Don't say that my Master is like me. Not yet!" With a quick, compassionate movement, Elspeth threw herself down beside the woman, and took the poor head on her breast.

"He loves you!" she pleaded. "He hung upon the dreadful cross that your sins might be blotted out. Will you accept him? Do say you will. I love you, too!"

The woman burst into bitter tears. She grasped the hand of the deaconess as if it were her only hope—and indeed it was—and in that moment the Good Shepherd found the wanderer.

At the crowded meeting Sister Elspeth led that evening the girls whispered to each other that their leader's face was beautiful—shining like an angel's.

At the close of a certain series of meetings a consecration service was held. Consecration meant, in the lips of the leader, not a vague phrase. but definite surrender of all, that the Lord might take what he would. First, parents were asked to raise their hands, signifying that they would say "yes" to the Lord, if he asked for their sons or daughters for mission or deaconess work. The mother of two beautiful daughters responded to the call, then sat in trembling prayer and expectation while the leader called for the young people to give themselves by coming forward. Would either of her daughters offer herself? Which one could she spare? Would it be Margaret, the elder, quiet one, or the warm-hearted Mabel? "O Lord, choose thou," she prayed. "I cannot tell which one I would rather spare."

The appeal was made for foreign missionaries, and her heart almost stopped its beating as here and there over the congregation young men and women rose and went forward. And yes, there was Mabel, going with them, the tears running over her sweet young face—her own child, willing to go to the uttermost ends of the earth. The mother's heart was almost bursting with pain and joy.

But, she thought, she would still have Margaret. As she tried to adjust her mind to the thought of the one child's going she was conscious of a relieved feeling that the other was to stay. The next call, for women ready to work in the homeland as deaconesses, fell on her ears like a far-off thing. Had not her gift been made? The girls crowding forward now were other mothers' daughters. But suddenly her heart gave a wild leap. Margaret was among them! Margaget, giving herself to be a deaconess! Could the Lord be calling her, too? And was the mother to be left alone?

But—"He lay down his life for us." Grace triumphed, and when the service was over the mother took her daughters to her heart with shining face and loving words. "I didn't think of the Lord's taking you both," she said, "and I couldn't decide which one I'd rather have him take, but now if I were to ask him I couldn't say which one I would have him give back. I am a happy woman—he has accepted my all."

A Strange Find in Egypt

MEN of great learning who have been digging into the long-buried secrets of the ancient Bible lands recently found a very strange thing at a place called Milawi, which is one hundred and eighty miles from Cairo. They found that in the palmy days of Egypt, long before the time of Joseph, there lived a king named Amenhotep II., whose queen was a Syrian and a sun worshiper. Now this queen, who was named Tyi, plotted to upset the ancient religion of Egypt and to introduce the worship of the sun, as it was practised in her native country. It was, of course, the grossest idolatry. So Tyi, the queen, sent to Syria and brought as a bride to her son her own kinswoman, Princess Nefertiti, an idolator like herself. And when Amenhotep, the king, died, his son ruled in his place and set up throughout the land of Egypt the worship of the sun. The old gods of Egypt were obscured and proscribed. A new and a great temple and capital city were built for the new religion.

But the king, who had renounced the ancient faith for the new idolatry, could not extend his influence beyond his own life. He had no son, and a kinsman succeeded him, under whom, within a brief generation, the national heresy disappeared, the old religion was restored and the idols, capital city and temple were leveled with the plain, beneath whose dust they have remained buried these three thousand years.

He Read it in a Prison

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I notice on the wrapper of my copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that I have reached the last issue. I cannot tell you how much pleasure it has given me to read the paper, from cover to cover, every week during the past six months.

The subscription was a present from a Christian lady, Mrs. Hattie Wellman, Oxford, N. Y. Had I the means, I should at once continue to be a subscriber, but I am penniless, and in prison.

Inasmuch as I cannot longer be one of your great Christian family, I feel you will be glad to know, at least, that it is not from a lack of appreciation of the paper. It has been my good fortune to let at least a dozen other men, who appreciate such literature, read it each week, thus making the gift a twelvefold one. C. C.

The Beginning of a Revival*

ALL Christians know that the ideal way of living would be to keep the soul constantly on fire with the love of Christ and the desire for his service. Everybody has seen saintly persons, who, to all appearance, live thus, but they are rare. Even Gipsy Smith, whose wonderful physical strength and burning zeal would seem to outsiders to keep him up perpetually to the highest level of spiritual activity, testifies that he, too, has had his moments of depression, when the light within him seemed turned to darkness and all that he could do was to pray.

For he knew that it was in prayer that the way to light lay, and that it would surely come back to him if he staid long enough on his knees. "It is prayer," he says, in effect, in his great sermon on "Gleaning for God," "that brings the victory. If you can get the right men on their knees at the prayer-meeting, you will have a revival. But they must live their prayers. Have they tried to save the cripple, the drunkard, the jail-bird, the seemingly accursed? Have they tried to rescue the perishing? If not, all their talk about religion amounts to nothing."

Jesus had simply to reveal himself to the Samaritan woman and she believed. Then she saw how good and wonderful he was, and she went forth at once to tell others. She was so excited that she left her water-pot behind her. It was glad news that she had to impart. Jesus, long foretold, he who was to save the world, had come at last.

Mr. Moody once related the story of a young soldier who was wounded and about to die. A messenger was sent for the evangelist. He had had no rest for two nights, but the call was urgent and he went. He says: "I shall never forget that young soldier's face as I saw it that night in the dim, uncertain candle-light. I asked what I could do for him, and he said that he wanted me to 'help him die.' I tried to preach the Gospel. He said, 'God can't save me. I have sinned all my life.' I repeated promise after promise, but nothing I said seemed to help him. At last, I read the words: 'As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' He said, 'I never knew that was in the Bible. Read it again.' Even a third time I had to repeat the passage. Then the troubled expression on his face had given way to a peaceful smile. His lips moved, and I heard him repeating the passage in a faint whisper. Early the next morning I came again to his cot, but it was empty. Turning to the attendant, I asked if the young man had died peacefully. He told me that after my visit the dying boy had rested quietly, repeating to himself now and then that glorious proclamation of liberty to the captive, 'Whosoever believeth in him shall not perish, but have eternal life.' "

It is the vivid presentation of Christ which is to quicken those who are dead in trespasses and sins. That is the only thing which can start a revival.

And after the vision has dawned upon the soul, then, if the new life is real which it inspires, there comes, to use the poetic language of George Matheson, "a new passion, a fresh energy, a second youth; the poet's dream—the belief that somewhere there is a city paved with gold; the communion of brotherhood; the faith that affection will abide; the assurance that between man and man devotion will not die. Then will the tempter vanish. Then will the kingdom come."

That is the only kind of revival which is real and enduring.

*Topic of the Epworth League for Sunday, May 2. TEXT: John 4: 5-42.

Life Lessons from Isaiah*

THE majestic poems of Isaiah touch the loftiest heights of inspiration in their language; while their constant references to Christ's coming give them a supernatural and prophetic character, which adds a heavenly glory to the exalted imagery of this greatest among the Hebrew writers.

In the first verses of the forty-second chapter, the mission of Christ is clearly defined. He was called "in righteousness." He would be supported by the very power of God on high. He would be a light to the Gentiles. He would open the blind eyes, and bring out from the prison-house them that sat in darkness.

Such, also, is our mission. We, too, must lead righteous lives; God will hold and keep us; and we are sent, like our Master, to help those who are in trouble.

As Christ was bruised and afflicted, so also must we be, if we would serve him aright; but after we have seen of the travail of our souls we, too, shall be "satisfied."

The lesson of peace is taught us in the wonderful second chapter. It was true that Christ came to send a sword upon earth. Before the world could turn to him, the rivers were to run red with blood. But as nations become civilized, the spears are to be beaten into pruning-hooks. That time has now arrived. The barbarous peoples must be treated at times in barbarous ways; but among the great Christian nations of the globe let law take the place of powder and dynamite. Every member of our society should join one of the great peace associations, and speak and write and pray that Christ's Spirit may rule in the councils of the nations, and that war may soon be banished forever. Thus we may earn the beatitude, "Blessed are the peacemakers."

To realize the need of banding together to discourage war, one has only to read of the enormous sums which are yearly expended upon armaments. Europe is staggering under the weight of thirty billion dollars of debt, most of it caused by wars or preparations for wars. She is spending one and a half billions every year for the maintenance of her armies and navies, and the sum grows annually larger.

"Our own nation leads the world," says Dr. Jefferson, "in the number of murders, and the proportionate increase of our military expenditures." He adds: "The civilization of the world is checked by this awful financial drain. England spends over $300,000,000 a year on her army and navy, and only $80,000,000 on education and science and art. Russia spends over $200,000,000 a year for her army and navy and only $22,000,000 on public instruction. Even the United States, in a time of profound peace, without an enemy in the world, is spending over $200,000,000 a year for our army and navy."

And as the spirit of wisdom and understanding grew in Christ, so should we strive after it, that we may the more resemble our Master. We should rejoice and banish the long face, because we have "drawn water from the wells of salvation." We should banish fear, for the promise is unto us and our children that we shall "obtain joy and gladness." And let us pray day and night that he will send us about his work, and touch our lips with a live coal from off his altar.

E. S., Newmarket, N. H. Do Free Baptist ministers consecrate young children for the purpose of inviting them to the Lord's Table? Is it the custom of Free Baptist ministers to invite children specially to the Lord's Table?

Rev. Robert Stuart MacArthur, Calvary Baptist Church, New York City, gives the following answer: "I do not think Free Baptist ministers very generally practise the rite of infant dedication. Regular Baptist ministers occasionally practise this rite; I have done it myself in several instances. In doing so, I have taken the utmost pains to say that the New Testament nowhere gives a command for or example of infant baptism. Really, the dedication is not on the part of the child, but on the part of the parents; it is an act on their part dedicating their interest in and their influence over their child; it is a pledge on their part to bring the child up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. I make it a solemn service."

R. W. F., Monon, Ind. Of what are violin strings made?

W. C. M., Ashton, Fla. 1. How near the truth does the brother come who says that sin is only what we are ashamed of; that the Scriptural term, "temple of the Holy Ghost," refers not to the body, and that the body affects not the soul? 2. Is the use of tobacco ever defensible, or are there not later bad effects, which always greatly counterbalance all first seeming good effects? 3. How near to fighting and deceiving can a true Christian come, believing that good will come out of it finally?

1. He does not come near the truth at all. The body is referred to in many Scripture passages as the temple of the Holy Ghost. See John 2:19, 21, and I. Cor. 6:19, and others. In the first quoted passage Christ refers to his own body as a temple which he would raise again on the third day. In I. Cor. 6:19, the statement is clear and unequivocal that it is the human body which is referred to as a temple. In this, as well as in other passages, the effect upon the spiritual nature of giving way to physical sin is very clearly set forth, and the connection between soul and body established, showing their interdependence and that one cannot serve God while the other serves the flesh. 2. Possibly it may be, in a medical sense. It is a vice undoubtedly, and besides being filthy and expensive frequently produces various diseases. It is pretty well established that tobacco users are not as successful in their studies as those who do not use it. 3. There is a justifiable anger—a "righteous indignation"—but the resort to violence is un-Christian and sinful. To try how near one can come to actual sin is to invite temptation needlessly.

J. M., Dubuque, Ia. Did not the phrase "Government of the people, by the people and for the people" originate with Lincoln? If not, who was the author?

Dr. R. Heber Newton has found the identical phrase in Theodore Parker's writings, and another authority traces it to a speech by Webster in 1830. Still another declares it is to be found in the introduction to the Wycliffe Bible (issued in 1384), in which it says: "This Bible is for the government of the people, by the people and for the people."

B. D., Detroit, Mich. What is the naval status of the different nations at present?

Their status was given in THE MAIL-BAG a few weeks ago. It may change materially, however, within a few years. There is a sharp rivalry between Great Britain and Germany. The latter power is pushing the construction of warships of the Dreadnought class, and Austria has just announced that she will build four Dreadnoughts as an aid to her ally, Germany. Even the South American republics have caught the "big navy" fever, and Argentina has begun work on two Dreadnoughts, to cost $10,000,000 each. The millennium is still a good way off.

English Reader, Fresno, Calif. Referring to your paper, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of February 24, 1909, you state that the Delaware is the largest battleship in the world. With all due respect to Uncle Sam's powerful navy, I think you will find that the British and the Japanese navy have several warships larger than the Delaware. It is so misleading to the public to see these statements in print.

The statement published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of February 24 is perfectly correct. Great Britain did have the largest ship until the Delaware was launched. She was larger than the British Dreadnought. The Delaware has now been followed by the U. S. North Dakota, which is even larger. The following comparison of ships of the new Dreadnought type, printed by the London Graphic, on March 27, from records in the possession of the British Admiralty, gives the United States the lead in the heavy battleship class as follows: The United States, the North Dakota, 22,075 tons; Great Britain, the St. Vincent, 19,250 tons (the largest British ship); Germany, the Rheinland, 19,000 tons; France, the Danton, 18,400 tons. Brazil and Austria come next with the new type of battleship. Japan is not in the list at all, as she has not yet launched a ship of the Dreadnought type. At present America leads in the size of ships. In number of ships Great Britain comes first and the United States second; Germany comes third, and Japan fourth. The United States has twenty-five battleships, Japan has fourteen.

Mrs. L. R., Cottage Grove, Ore. 1. The "beast" of Revelation 13 has been the subject of innumerable dissertations. Most commentators hold that the Roman world-power is represented, as it was through that power that the persecution of the Christians was to be conducted. See Professor Weiss' work on the subject, also Exposition on Revelation, by Knappenberger, Syracuse, N. Y. 2. There is no longer any organized Jewish nation or commonwealth, consequently tribal relations are no longer recognized, although the Hebrews preserve with jealous care their genealogies which show their tribal descent. 3. It is the belief of the orthodox Jews that they will eventually be brought back to their own land.

Astronomical Queries

Answered by Prof. S. P. Leland, Ph.D., LL.D., Seabreeze, Fla.

W. A. B., Interlaken, N. Y. This winter, in Florida, I noticed a bright star considerably south of Orion and to the right of Canis Major. The star is not visible in the north. I concluded it must be either Alpha in Columba Noachi, or Canopus in Argo Navis. Is Canopus visible in North Florida?

The star of which you speak is doubtless Alpha in Columba, as Canopus is much farther south.

J. T., Canada. The moon, in about a month, makes a circuit of the sky in an opposite direction to the diurnal motion; that is, while it appears to rise and set like other objects in the sky, and to move from east to west, yet every evening it rises about three-quarters of an hour later, and thus falls behind the stars in its movement. This can be seen by noting its position with any star on two or three consecutive evenings. This recession causes the moon to constantly change its position with relation to the sun. When it is on the same side of the earth as the sun, it is invisible to us because its lighted side is from us. As it falls back from that line of conjunction in about two days, it presents a slender crescent, the convexity of which is always towards the sun. It is now called a new moon. Each night more of its lighted surface is visible, and after a few days it has reached its first quarter, then full moon, etc. And this is repeated every lunar month.

TURN OVER TIME

When Nature Hints About the Food.

When there's no relish to any food and all that one eats doesn't seem to do any good then is the time to make a turn over in the diet, for that's Nature's way of dropping a hint that the food isn't the kind required.

"For a number of years I followed railroad work, much of it being office work of a trying nature.

"Meal times were our busiest part of the day. Eating too much and too quickly of food such as is commonly served in hotels and restaurants, together with the sedentary habits were not long in giving me dyspepsia and stomach trouble which reduced my weight from 205 to 160 pounds.

"There was little relish in any food and none of it seemed to do me any good. It seemed the more I ate the thinner I got and was always hungry before another meal, no matter how much I had eaten.

"Then I commenced a fair trial of Grape-Nuts and was surprised how a small saucer of it would carry me along, strong and with satisfied appetite, until the next meal, with no sensations of hunger, weakness or distress as before.

"I have been following this diet now for several months and my improvement has been so great all the others in my family have taken up the use of Grape-Nuts, with complete satisfaction and much improvement in health and brain power.

"American people undoubtedly eat hurriedly, have lots of worry, thus hindering digestion and therefore need a food that is predigested and concentrated for nourishment." "There's a Reason."

A PROMISE TO PAY

WOULD YOU accept a stranger's note? No. Then why accept from a stranger any other promise to pay? A fire insurance policy is such a promise. Ought you to accept it without knowing all about the Company? Your usual business confidence is based on knowledge. Why make an exception in that part of your business which deals with insurance? A name is worth nothing on any kind of a promise to pay unless it is backed by character and resources.

THE HARTFORD FIRE INSURANCE CO. favors insurance knowledge, particularly about itself. Its promise to pay has never gone to protest. Its obligations to its policy holders are backed with such a good reputation and such ample financial resources that the more you know about it the more you will want protection by its policies.

It has published a book, "Fire Prevention and Fire Insurance," which contains in separate chapters valuable information for Householders, Merchants and Manufacturers. It ought to be in the hands of every property owner in America. It may save you thousands of dollars. It is FREE. Send for it.

Paul's First Missionary Journey

By Mrs. M. Baxter

NOW, we come to the first real missionary work among the heathen. "There were in the church at Antioch certain prophets and teachers; Barnabas, and Simeon that was called Niger, and Lucius of Cyrene, and Manaen, which had been brought up with Herod the tetrarch, and Saul." Five teachers in one church! But they were men at God's disposal, ready to learn the mind of God, and to carry out whatever he should call them to. "They ministered to the Lord and fasted." Something must have led them to do so, there must have been a conscious need which drove them to come thus apart. We cannot believe that they were actuated by the spirit which prompts some to force God to answer their prayers by fasting and prayer, as though he were unwilling, and had to be compelled.

As they ministered and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, "Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them." This was indeed a "Holy Ghost call." Would that every minister, every missionary, every evangelist had such a call. Some are chosen by men because it would be a credit to the family to have a clergyman amongst them. If we are doing any work for God, let us be sure that the Holy Ghost has called us to that work, and then neither difficulties, hindrances nor even impossibilities will hold us back, for God, who has sent us, is equal to them all. Discouragement cannot find room in the heart of a man who is sent of God.

Our hearts are often saddened when we hear of those who have put their hands to the plow and have turned back. We hear of men who have been educated for the ministry going into business; we hear of missionaries remaining a year or two in the field, and then turning back and getting some comfortable post at home. We hear of Scripture-readers and Bible women finding that they did not get as much personal advantage as they expected through becoming such, and so just turning back to another line of life, as though the winning of souls were only one means out of many to gain a respectable livelihood! We see those who have joined some evangelistic agency and begun work with the greatest zeal soon lose courage and turn back again. And thus unbelievers mock at the call of the Holy Ghost as though it were a mere imagination, and the work of our God is spoken against. Few of these of whom we have spoken have, we fear, really known the true call.

Then the elders laid their hands on Barnabas and Saul, and sent them away. So they, being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, departed. If I am sent forth by the Holy Ghost, then He who sends me forth is responsible for all the consequences of my going forth; strength, talent, wisdom, judgment, as well as food, lodging and clothing become his responsibility; he does not send us a warfare at our own, but at his charges. "Being sent forth by the Holy Ghost," they came to Salamis, in the island of Cyprus, and "preached the Word of God in the synagogue of the Jews." They did not take up this work because they thought they would like it, but because God willed it. Nothing is told us of the fruit of their labors in this place.

And when they had gone to Paphos, they found a sorcerer. Elymas, this wretched man, was in league with the powers of darkness, and saw how contrary Christianity was to his own practices, and he opposed God's messengers.

This is no uncommon thing; wherever a work of God is going on in power, there the devil is close at hand to withstand it. These are Satan's favorite instruments in our day for turning men away from the faith.

What would Saul do? He could not stand against that power of the devil in Elymas by virtue of any power which was in him, but he knew by blessed experience the power of God. Thus, "filled with the Holy Ghost," he denounced Elymas, and the sorcerer was stricken with blindness.

THREE VIEWS ON WOMAN SUFFRAGE

FROM the many letters that are now reaching us dealing with the question of the suffrage, we give below three that present the women's side of the question, each from an entirely different standpoint:

Dear Christian Herald: I believe the purity of the home would be greatly helped by the giving of the ballot to women. There are many mothers who deplore the sort of posters that often disfigure our blank walls; the wording of the advertisements there; the great prevalence of whisky advertisements, and the often vile and disgusting moving pictures in the slot machines. Mothers can keep their boys pure and good until they begin to see these suggestive sights. I believe that we could banish them if we women could only vote. I think we could do good in many other ways also, and I thank you for helping the cause. I. O.

To the Christian Herald: I want to thank you for your kind words for women. Many of us feel as though we might do good if we should vote; but we may be surrounded by those who ridicule us if we say so—call us "strong-minded" and "masculine," and make us foolishly afraid to say what we think. You have expressed the feelings of a very large class of women who ardently wish to vote, and deeply feel the disgrace and inferiority implied in the inability to do so, but who, for one reason or another, dare not say what they think. E. F. R.

Dear Editor: While I am willing to confess that I, as a woman, would like to have a vote, I must admit that until our sex changes its attitude materially on certain things there is little likelihood of our enfranchisement. Let us frankly ask ourselves whether there are not many among us whose notions of finance generally are so widely extravagant that they could hardly be considered qualified to take up serious questions of public expenditures. Further, is it true or otherwise, that women, as a class, betray a woful lack of what men call solidarity? My youngest brother (who is a voter, by the way) says, "Belle, the girls will never have the suffrage until they quit their foolishness in dress, and especially in headgear. Why, any one who walks down street can see fifty different styles of hat, each more hideous than the other, and no two alike. Some of them would excite the envy of a Fiji Islander, who has only a few feathers stuck in her hair—poor little heathen!" "Tom," I cried, "you are an ungallant fellow. You should give us equal representation, seeing we are equally burdened by the State—" "Oho!" said he, "equally burdened, are you? Well, I didn't think of that, of course. Let's see. Who does the fighting when the country needs to be defended? Who digs the coal, the iron, the salt? Who cuts and saws the lumber, and builds the ships? Who runs the railroads—" And just then, as I was about to fling my inkstand at him, he fled. It's always the way with such men; they won't stand for a fair argument, but must take a woman unawares with their nonsensical talk.

I hope soon to see our women with the suffrage. Then we'll show the other sex that we have businesslike notions about various other things besides our hats and gowns.

Yonkers, N. Y. Bella H—.

TRUE FRIENDSHIP

FRIENDS we may have, both kind and true,
But genuine friends are very few;
In fact, like melons on the vine,
To find one good we must try nine,
And when that one is put to test,
That friendship proves to be the best.

Friends we may have who come and go,
But life-long friends are never so,
It matters not where each may be
In any land or on the sea,
Friendship's message goes to and fro
To keep each heart with love aglow.

Friends we have, let's bear in mind,
Whose value would be hard to find;
And when we know this to be true
Let friendship tell us what to do.
Consider well what it is worth
While we are still upon the earth.

Carrying Styles to Paris

Seems like carrying coals to Newcastle. Coal in Newcastle could not be sold; styles in Paris would not be purchased. But in Paris at our salesrooms, 27 Avenue de l'Opéra, thousands of women buy thousands of Butterick Patterns every month. Truly a great tribute from Paris to the pre-eminence of BUTTERICK.

Other fashion establishments may purchase ideas from Paris. Butterick, alone, both purchases and sells, and the selling proves the worth of the purchase.

From Paris six fashion experts and artists - Parisian-born, and breathing daily the artistic and temperamental atmosphere of that wonderful city—are each day sending us fashion's latest word by letter and cable. In each mail come new ideas—new illustrations. These experts are always in touch with the great fashion creators—the autocrats of style in Paris. This constant daily connection through more than one observer assures the priority, correctness and superiority of Butterick Fashions.

You can secure these services—unsurpassed in the Fashion World—for $1.00 a year, the subscription price of THE DELINEATOR.

Questions and Answers

Anonymous communications cannot receive attention in "The Mail-Bag."

H. M., Honolulu, Hawaii. Please explain Heb. 6:4-6.

The defection in matters of religion may be partial or complete. See Heb. 10:6. If heretical doctrines are admitted in a church, the result very soon becomes apparent in a decline of spirituality and a loss of fervor and zeal in religious duty. The usual causes of backsliding are worldly cares, neglect of prayer, indulgence, secret vices, dallying with temptation and choosing the society of unbelievers. The description in Heb. 6:4-6 should be especially studied by pastors and other leaders in the church, who should be scrupulously careful to set a good example to the flock.

W. A. M., Gatesville, N. C. 1. How old was Job when the Lord turned his captivity? 2. Was Esther the mother of Darius?

1. It is inferred that he was about seventy at the time of his great trial. 2. In the opinion of eminent historical authorities she was not. Amestris was the wife of Xerxes (Ahasuerus), and with her sons accompanied Xerxes to Greece. Darius, the eldest son, married after returning from Greece. Esther did not enter the king's palace till the year of Darius' marriage.

E. H. A., Hiram, O. It seems by the account in Acts 2, and other places, that in those days the receiving of the Holy Ghost was a very definite and tangible experience. Does the New Testament anywhere intimate that there would be any change in the nature or in the manifestation of this gift? Does any one in these days have any tangible experience corresponding to that recorded in Acts 2 and Acts 19, in regard to receiving the Holy Ghost?

There has never been but one Pentecost. There have been many occasions in later days, when the Spirit of God has been present in power and manifested itself; but the great and wonderful experiences of that first Pentecostal visitation have never been repeated. There is a great diversity of opinion in regard to the "gift of tongues." We know of no well-authenticated case of the sort in modern times, although we know that the "gift" is claimed by certain religious sects.

H. D., Chehalis, Wash. Are there lenses that can concentrate the rays of the sun so strongly that they will melt metal, iron, etc.?

No lens has been made strong enough to affect metal. Extra strong lenses have set fire to wood when the wood has been very dry.

L. E. L., Ocean City, N. J. Give the rank list in the American Army and Navy.

The rank list in the United States Army is as follows: General, lieutenant-general, major-general, brigadier-general, colonel, lieutenant-colonel, major, captain, first lieutenant, second lieutenant. Non-commissioned officers: first sergeant, sergeant, corporal, private. Rank in the United States Navy is as follows: Admiral, vice-admiral, captain, commander, lieutenant-commander, lieutenant, ensign. Then there are various grades of non-commissioned officers, known as petty officers. The seamen are also divided into several classes, the more experienced receiving more pay. The office of general and admiral are given for great service. At present our highest rank held by an officer is lieutenant-general. Dewey is a full admiral. Usually the highest officer in the Navy is a rear-admiral.

M. M. B., Craik, Canada. 1. According to the latest statistics, how many Roman Catholics are there in the world? 2. How many Protestants?

Catholics, 230,866,533; Protestants, 143,237,625. These are the best obtainable estimates, but we cannot vouch for their accuracy.

F. S. H., Wenatchee, Wash. Is there such a thing as a madstone? I have a stone that some say is a madstone. Could you please tell me where I could send it to have it tested?

A madstone when applied to a wound is said to adhere and to absorb any virus or poison in the wound. We know of no place where you could send it to be tested. Physicians regard madstones as of doubtful value.

C. S. C., Mogollon, N. M. 1. Who are the Armenians, and where do they live? 2. What is their religion?

1. Armenia is a mountainous country in Western Asia. It formerly stretched from the Caspian Sea on the east to Asia Minor on the west. The territory is now divided between Persia, Russia and Turkey, the latter having the largest share. The inhabitants are mostly of the Armenian stock. The Armenians number 2,000,000, one-half being in Armenia; the rest are scattered over Western Asia and Eastern Europe. 2. They became Christians in the third century. Although persecuted by the Turks, they have remained true to the Christian faith. They exist separately from both the Roman and Greek churches.

M. S., Washougal, Wash. How many representatives are there from the State of Washington, both in the House of Representatives and Senate; also their names and home towns?

The Senators from the State of Washington are Wesley L. Jones, of North Yakima, and Samuel H. Piles, of Seattle. The Representatives are William E. Humphrey, Seattle; Francis W. Cushman, Tacoma; Miles Poindexter, Spokane.

H. A. B. 1. The four Gospels are each supplementary of the others, and incomplete without each other. This explains why events mentioned in one Gospel may not appear in the others. 2. The passage about baptism for the dead has given rise to much discussion. It has been said that the Corinthians practised a vicarious baptism in the case of those who had died unbaptized, a relative standing in their stead. Another explanation is that the ancient martyrs were referred to, over whose remains churches were built, in which vows were taken. Still another is that the example of the martyrs stimulated the unbantized living to baptism. Baptism for the dead was a superstitious custom among people in ancient Africa, and is mentioned by several early writers. 3. There is no explanation of the other question.

H. S., Eldorado, Kan. What are the names of the president and secretary of the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition, which is to be held at Seattle this summer?

The president is J. E. Chilberg, the secretary is W. M. Sheffield.

W. M. B., Learned, Miss. 1. Please explain "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling." 2. How long will it take the United States to get back the money it has spent and will spend on the Panama Canal?

1. Grace is inactive without our will, hence the order as to "work." "Fear and trembling" simply mean the holy reverence which accompanies obedience (see Eph. 6:5; I. Cor. 2:3; II. Cor. 7:15); not slavish fear, like the terror of a mind in danger of condemnation, but anxiety to do what the Lord would have us do, and the realization that our own merits are insufficient and we must trust Him to give strength for our weakness. The last clause of the sentence (verse 14) confirms this interpretation. 2. Any answer would be pure conjecture. A new tariff may bring it all back in a few years.

Mrs. O. M., New Jersey. Where is Brow Head, from which the passing of Atlantic steamers are reported?

Brow Head is on the southwest coast of Ireland, a little east of Dunmanus Bay. Fastness Rock lighthouse is about fourteen miles southeast of the Head.

Walter H., Logansport, Pa. How long was Noah in the Ark?

Noah entered the Ark in the six hundredth year of his life (the 17th day of the second month). One week later, the 40 days' rain began. On the seventeenth day of the seventh month, or 150 days after the deluge began, the Ark rested on Ararat. The waters continued to decrease until the first day of the tenth month; 40 days later Noah sent forth the raven; seven days later a dove, seven days later a dove again, and a third time seven days later a dove. On the first day of the first month the waters were dried and on the twenty-seventh day of the second month Noah left the Ark and built an altar.

Mrs. M. E. H., Garvanza, Calif. Why has the gift of divine healing, which was given to the apostles and commanded to be used by them, come into disuse? Is not our Saviour the same now, willing and able to save from sin and to heal the sick? If so, why is this doctrine not taught and practised more at the present time?

It has come into disuse because of a lack of faith and spirituality in the church. Some have held that it was a gift peculiar to apostolic days alone; but there are many who believe that, with a revival of faith and a reconsecration of the members of the Christian Church, the gift can be realized anew. This is, to a certain extent, the claim of the Emmanuel Movement and its leaders.

It sometimes seems to an editor as though a large part of the effort expended upon his work were without avail. But now and then a word reaches him which affords encouragement. For example, one lady who subscribes for several copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, writes:

"One of the homes into which I take the paper is most interesting. The family consists of the father, mother, four lovely girls and one son. The mother is a thoroughly good woman, and is trying hard to bring up her children to be an honor to her Saviour, but she is so poor that not only the luxuries but even some of the necessaries of life are impossible for her. Of course, she cannot subscribe for any periodicals, and her gratitude for THE HERALD is fine to witness. All the children read it, and as for herself she reads even the advertisements.

"In another home where the paper goes, the husband is not a Christian, but the wife says that now he asks every Sunday before she leaves for church, 'Where is THE CHRISTIAN HERALD?' He reads as she goes, and when she returns after church he is still reading it. Our delight was great when, last Sunday, he accompanied her to church. We hope that he may soon become a regular attendant.

"I have a splendid Sunday School class of twenty-seven young ladies. To-day we had an unusual number of young men at church, and we gave them a special invitation to stay to Sunday School, as we had something of interest to say to them. I presented to them the matter of organized Bible classes for men and urged them to remain and talk it over. The result is better than I had dared to hope. We have had heretofore only two young men over sixteen years of age in the Sunday School; but to-day a large number stayed and talked up class work. They actually organized, with eleven charter members. Is not that fine!"

It is in places like this that the honest labor for souls shows most plainly, both the labor of the individual and that of the religious journal.

E. M. S., Wheeling, W. Va. 1. Is there any law that would bar a Catholic from holding the office of President of the United States? 2. Is it breaking the temperance pledge to eat cake in which an intoxicating liquor is used as an ingredient? Is the alcohol dispelled during the process of baking or not?

1. No. 2. Although cake in which alcohol is used is not mentioned in the pledge, it is expected that the signer would not indulge in it either as a beverage or as a food. The taste of the alcohol is not lost, otherwise it would not have been put in.

The Funeral of Police Lieutenant Petrosino, in New York City

ONE of the most imposing funerals seen in New York for many years, was that of the gallant Police Lieutenant Petrosino, who was assassinated in Sicily while endeavoring to trail some desperate criminals. Several thousand mounted and infantry police, with firemen, formed the escort, and the burial was conducted as a military one. Two hundred thousand people lined the streets as the cortège passed.

M. J. S., Brookville, Pa. We regret that we have no information in regard to the mosques. There is a temple in San Francisco dedicated to a form of Oriental worship brought from India, and one is to be built in India. Unfortunately, the followers of the cult here are not Indians, but descendants of Europeans.

C. B. A., Gouverneur, N. Y. We are unable to answer your question in regard to history. No one knows what the Adamic language was called. Some races have had a complete change of language since the days of authentic history. The names of some animals retain nearly the same name in closely related languages, but it is not a general rule. For example, the English have the word horse while the French use the word cheval for the same animal, the Germans pferd.

Gleaning in the Fields

View of Nazareth, from the North

AMONG THE WOMEN OF NAZARETH

By WILLIAM DURBAN

MISS KATHERINE M. STRONG is one of the band of Christian missionaries scattered through Syria. She lately returned to Nazareth, after a visit to her home in England. Just before she started on her voyage for Palestine, she gave me an account of her experiences in the city dear to Christian hearts, where the Saviour for thirty years had his home.

"It is to the Moslems that we missionaries are specially sent," she said. "In Nazareth I found much work being done among members of the Greek and Protestant Churches, and a few Latin Catholics were also being reached. But the real purpose of our work is to influence the Moslem population rather than the Christians. The numerous villages are very largely populated by non-Christians, and in six of these there are day schools established by the Church Missionary Society. In Nazareth itself there is a large school for boys open to all sects and religions, and also day schools for girls, one of which has ninety Moslem children. Then in the large Girls' Orphanage Moslem girls are learning side by side with Christians, while evangelistic work is being carried on by house-to-house visitation and by women's meetings."

Concerning the life of the woman of Palestine Miss Strong said: "It must be very different to-day from that described in the Bible. The majority of the women are not of Jewish, but of Moslem, parentage. This, among the poorer people, means a life of drudgery and hardship. 'What is our life but cursing?' asked a poor Moslem woman, when rebuked for her language. The wife of a Moslem is either his toy or his drudge. If he has no boys, she always runs the risk of seeing another wife brought in. If her husband is not satisfied with her looks or her character, he may send her home again before a week of their married life is finished. I am no longer astonished, as I was when I arrived in Palestine, that among the women one meets in the street one hears hundreds of curses, but scarcely ever a hearty laugh. If a pretty girl is married to a rich husband, she has, it is true, an easy life; but is it the life of a rational human being? She has nothing to do but to dress up in her jewels, scold her servants, and gossip with her neighbors, who may only visit her if thickly veiled. She has probably never learned to read or write; and her husband does not think her worth talking with, except on most trivial subjects. The children of such marriages rarely learn anything good from either parent. The boys go to the Moslem school, where they are instructed in the Koran, repeating it by heart, while they sway to and fro; and from their fellow-pupils they learn those curses and imprecations in which their language is so rich. From the moment he is born the boy is the idol of his parents. The sweetest coffee is offered to friends who come with their congratulations, and guns are fired in honor of his birth. The boy, as he grows up, sees his father rise up from prayer to lie and cheat without a blush. It is easy to understand how the poor lad learns to disconnect religion with true character, and how his training must be fatal to any high standard of ethics.

A Shepherd of Nazareth and His Flock

"In some places in Palestine," she continued, "the difference of attitude toward missionaries has been very marked, after long years of patient work; but in many localities it is 'underground work,' which is little noticed, real though it be. Some happy days come, when a brave man takes his life in his hand and passes the boundary between Islam and Christianity; but these are cases about which only the missionaries and their closest friends know anything. Many, we believe, may be reckoned among the noble army of martyrs, not so much for their deaths as for the matter of their lives.

"One girl from our Nazareth Orphanage, married to a Moslem in a far-off village, had her very name changed in order that the missionaries might lose sight of her; but news reached us that persecution had not stopped her from reading her Bible. The Church in Egypt gains sometimes by Palestine's losses. I have been struck by the fact that, if you trace back the history of a Syrian convert, in nine cases out of ten you find that the first influence was that of a Christian mission school. In face of this, how can any one deny the importance of educational work? But there are certainly many now who, while outwardly Moslem, have become Christians at heart, but for fear of martyrdom hesitate to make an open profession."

"And now," I suggested, "the new liberty in the whole Turkish empire will make a difference?"

"It is indeed to be hoped so," replied Miss Strong. "But we cannot positively predict. The Constitution demanded by the Young Turks and granted by the Sultan is young as yet. It has been welcomed very warmly, and even enthusiastically, in Palestine; but many thoughtful persons shake their heads dubiously and nervously and say, 'Wait and see what may happen later on.'

"While living with the ladies carrying on the school and evangelistic work, it was my lot sometimes to help in each of these by turns, while also studying Arabic for my first examination. Let me give you the routine of a day: Breakfast is at 7:30. Then we have prayers in Arabic with the servants, and afterward English prayers. Arabic study follows, and perhaps a lesson to some young missionary recruit. Lunch is at 12:30. We then go visiting for three hours with the native Bible-woman and take supper at 6. On one evening in the week we have a prayer meeting in Arabic, and on another a congregational practice of hymns and chants; but other evenings are usually quiet times for reading, sewing, preparation for classes or English lessons to some native teacher thirsting for knowledge."

A SERMON BY

Rev. W. J. Dawson, D.D.*

The Two Touches

TEXTS—Matt. 8:3; Luke 8:45

YOU will notice at once that these passages represent not only two separate narratives, but two different experiences, each leading to the same end—cleansing, healing, redemption. In the first narrative Christ touches the leper: and the point to be noticed is how little the man appears to do for himself. He comes to Jesus; he has faith enough to believe that Jesus is able to cleanse him, he is willing to be cleansed, and that is all. He acquiesces in redemption rather than seeks it with passion; he has the humility of utter helplessness, and little more. He knows himself sick, and he is willing to trust himself in the hands of the Great Physician. When you have said that, you have described the man. Well, that does not seem very much to be able to say about him, but possibly it stands for a great deal more than we are at first disposed to imagine. There is a pathetic and dreadful chapter in literary biography in the life of Charlotte Brontë—a chapter which describes the death of her brother. He never admitted that he was sick; he scorned help, scorned to confess weakness; he hardened his pride against the stroke of death, and actually died standing. Many of us, in the same manner, are too proud to admit our need of help. With feet that tremble, with heart that flutters wildly, while the very life is draining from us, we refuse help, we prefer to die standing. Now it is much to admit the need for help, to come to Christ, however doubtfully and reluctantly; and on those who come, though it may be with hearts full of doubt and questioning, with nothing to recommend them but the humility of their helplessness, Christ puts his touch. It is a great thing to be willing to acknowledge ourselves Christ's patients.

Secret Trouble

But in the second narrative you find a totally different temper and experience. Jesus did not touch this woman; she touched him. She came, and she was willing to be saved; but she was more than willing and acquiescent, she was passionately in earnest to be healed. Notice the course of her drama, how pitiful and how pathetic it is! It is a drama of silent suffering. Her trouble, we read, was a secret trouble. For twelve years she had carried in her heart that secret trouble. There are those who know something of secret trouble. What a mask the human face is! How little we know of one another! How rarely do we penetrate behind the smile, behind the familiar aspect, to the secret which is often a secret of trouble! It was not only a drama of secret trouble with this woman, but a drama of thought. She said within herself, "If I may but touch Him." Ah! those conversations we have had with ourselves; those long, tangled, perplexed, weary dialogues, that go on in our own mind; those voices always speaking, always contradicting one another, which we cannot silence! This woman heard the dialogue within her of doubt and fear, of pain and trouble; "she said within herself." And it was a drama of action. She came trembling. And so you see the case that is presented here is totally different from the first case. The woman seeks and finds, knocks and it is opened to her, prays and receives; she is more than willing, and more than acquiescent; she takes active, positive, passionate steps to get into the presence of the great Healer and to be made whole.

Christ's Touch and Our Faith

What I want you to consider for a moment, then, is a very simple, but a very profound thing: it is that salvation consists of two acts—something done for you, and something that you do for yourself. It is the meeting of two desires—Christ's desire to save you and your desire to be saved; it is the union of two wills—Christ's will to heal you and your will to be healed; it consists of two touches—Christ's touch on you and your touch of faith on Christ.

Think, for a moment, first of all, what is meant by Christ's touch upon you. Who is there who has not said, in the verse of the familiar hymn:

> I think when I read that sweet story of old,
> When Jesus was here among men,
> How he called little children as lambs to his fold,
> I should like to have been with him then.

Oh, how easy faith in Christ would have been, how easy the pure and the ideal life would have been, if Jesus were still among men!

One of our great poets, Matthew Arnold, has expressed the same thought for us when he says:

> Oh, had I lived in that great day,
> How had its glory new
> Filled earth and heaven, and caught away
> My ravished spirit, too!

And then he goes on to say, in utter faithlessness:

> Now he is dead: far hence he lies
> In the lorn Syrian town,
> And on his grave, with shining eyes,
> The Syrian stars look down.

My brethren, that is not true. Christ is as much upon the earth to-day, nay, more upon the earth to-day, than ever he was. Then, in the days of his flesh, he could touch a man or woman here and there; but now, in the freedom and the grace and the power of the Spirit, he can touch all hearts the wide world over; and far truer than that despairing verse of Arnold's is that line of the hymn we sometimes sing:

> His touch has still its ancient power;
> No word from him can fruitless fall.

"It is expedient for you," said Jesus Christ to his disciples, "that I should go away"—expedient for you. And I think that that was the saddest and most perplexing word that Jesus ever spoke to those men who loved him. If Jesus had said, "It is expedient for me to go away," they would have understood it. There is many a dying man who faces death as John Sterling did, with "very little of fear and very much of hope," and feels as the shadow falls upon him that it is a cool and grateful shadow. It is expedient for him to go away. It means farewell to tears and sadness, to the torture and the misery of pain, to the vain struggle, to the risks and the vicissitudes of life, to the harshness of unmerited defeat. It is expedient for him to go away. How much more might one say that, who saw beyond the fading shore-line of the earth the shining summits of eternity, and felt the breath of life from the unassailable paradise of the blessed already moving through his heart with the fragrance of immortality! But that was not what Christ said. He did not say, "It is expedient for me." He said, "It is expedient for you that I go away." And why? Because he knew that death meant for him liberation and enfranchisement. He who, with all the toil of a crowded day, could touch but a very few here and there, now that he was lifted up would draw all men to himself. "Lo, I am with you alway, to the end of the world." It was a word that could not have been spoken until death was left behind. It was a word spoken to the spirit, and so, when we think of the touch of Christ, we must think of it as a spiritual touch upon the heart and the conscience of men.

How It Transforms a Life

Think for a moment of what this touch means upon human lives. Turn for a moment in your thoughts to Christ's great parable of the Prodigal Son, and ask who or what was it that so touched the prodigal that he turned home. Was it a mission service? Was it some wise teacher that met him? Was it some old prophet that barred his path? Was it some chance word of tenderness, or warning, or reproach, that pierced his conscience? There is no hint of anything of the kind. Whatever happened, happened silently and secretly. It was a touch that fell upon the spirit—

> Deep in the human heart, foiled by the tempter, > Feelings lie buried that grace can restore—

and while there are many public ministries that touch the chords of feeling, if we were left to public ministries hopeless indeed would be our lot. There is a silent, and the secret, ministry that goes straight to the buried feelings, and whensoever our hearts stir with the desire for good, whensoever our conscience rises up and speaks to us in reproof, it is the touch of the hand of Christ upon the hidden chord. Christ touches us in spite of our sins. Have you noticed in the parable of the Good Samaritan the varied significance of the phrases that are used concerning the priest, the Levite and the Samaritan? You read that the priest saw him, and that was all. You read that the Levite came to the place where the wounded man was, and that was all. But you read of the Samaritan that he came where he was. You and I are like that wounded traveler. Society comes and looks upon us, that is all; morality comes and looks, comes to the very place where we are and looks, but passes by; Jesus comes where we are, in the lowest depth—whatever depth that may be. Oh, Christian people, have we learned that lesson? "First of all," says the apostle, speaking of his converts, "first of all they gave themselves" to the work. And where there is the touch there is a more powerful Gospel than all that philanthropy can bring to bear upon the problems of suffering and sorrow.

Christ touches us also by our sins. Here is a deep truth in spiritual pathology of which it is difficult to speak at all, because it is difficult to speak of it without being misunderstood. And is it a truth, that through sin itself the cure of sin may come? Why did Christ suffer Peter to fall? It is true he warned him, it is true he prayed for him, but might not Christ have done more, might not Christ have kept the disciple for whom he feared, so close to himself that he should not have a moment in which to fall? Christ knew that not until Peter had fallen would he ever rise. He was to rise by falling. Or again, to take another instance, why did the father of the prodigal let the son go into the far country? Because he knew that only by renouncing his sonship could he become a son; only by finding out the misery of the far country would he seek the old home; only when he had forsaken the old home would the pure and beautiful vision of the dutiful life there rise up before him and allure him.

The Gathering Storm of Sin

Physicians speak of the bursting of a nerve storm. For a long time, it may be, deterioration has gone on in brain and nerve, and then there comes a perfect tempest of agony, a tornado passing over nerve and brain, some great crisis, and it leaves calm, it leaves sanity, it leaves peace. That is nature's way of casting out the perilous stuff. The evil spirit comes out, but he rends us as he comes out. So sin is like a disease which goes on and on till at last the hour of torment comes, the gathering of the storm, and the finger of God then becomes a finger of flame, and out of that torture, out of the bursting of that cruel storm, there comes the desire for the paths of peace, the ways of righteousness. If you have known that storm, that torture, be thankful; for "the torture of sin is better than its intoxication."

Shall I tell you what is the thing to be most dreaded about sin? It is atrophy. Acts of sin done without shame, without compunction; outrages upon the soul, that the soul no longer resents and no longer feels to be outrages—that is the last stage of moral ruin. To use another medical illustration: when the doctor says feeling has gone, you know that it is the sentence of doom; mortification has set in, and death is inevitable. And so the apostle Paul, in speaking of some men, says, "They are past feeling." Be thankful, then, for the torturing finger of Christ when it is laid upon the heart. For where there is the capacity for feeling there is the capacity for renovation and for health. "Shall a man complain, a living man, for the punishment of his sin?" says Ezekiel; nay, rather let him thank God that he can feel the punishment of his sin. That is a precursor of renovation. The finger of Christ is not always a finger that touches the wound to heal; it is a finger of flame sometimes, to pierce into the very depths of the wound and to bring us agony.

The Stirring of Good Desires

And Christ touches us from our sins. To use the old illustration of Bunyan, the familiar picture he draws of the man with a muckrake, what can make a man look up from the mire but some arresting touch upon the shoulder, some hand that points him to the quiet stars and wide heavens, and vision purer and sweeter than the vision that is in the dust? These are the ways in which the touch of Christ is a real touch upon human life. Whoever we may be, we have known one or other, or perhaps all, these touches upon our heart. We have known the silent touch of Christ, the sacred stirring and movement within ourselves of good desires. They have come to us when we least expected them, they have come in the memory of "the voice that is still." They have come in our hours of solitude, they have come in "the dead, unhappy night, when the rain was on the roof," and the heart was disquieted within

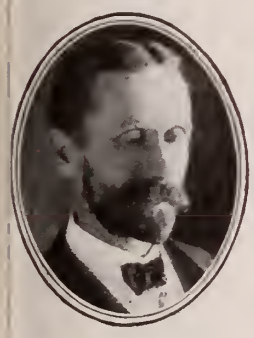
Canada's National Missionary Congress

ONE of the most important congresses of the year was the Canadian National Missionary Congress, held March 31-April 4, in Toronto. Over four thousand carefully selected commissioners, representing every province of the Dominion of Canada and Newfoundland, from every branch of the evangelical church, met to discuss the problem of Christian missions and to formulate a national missionary policy.



Rev. C. W. Gordon
(One of the Speakers)

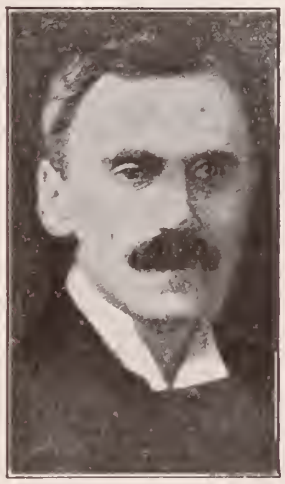
Since Pentecost and Ascension, the alert secretary of the American Laymen's Association, Mr. J. Campbell White, says, no more important or epoch-making gathering ever took place. As a result of this congress plans are being laid for similar gatherings in Scotland, Australia and the United States.

The congress was most important because of its representatives, its spirit and its policy. The chairman was that great Christian layman and missionary enthusiast, Mr. Newton W. Rowell, K.C. At his side were distinguished business men, judges, lawyers, editors, clergymen, governors and men of every other honest enterprise, but all animated with a spirit of devout allegiance to Christ and a steady, determined zeal to advance his kingdom in an earnest, business-like way. Practical addresses on church financing and missionary polity were given. The claims of Christ and the non-Christian world were set forth in no uncertain words.

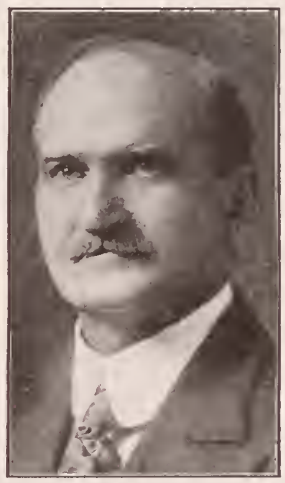
Mr. Robert E. Speer spoke on the subject of "The Great Commission and the Awakened East." Bishop Thoburn's beautiful and optimistic address on "The Sure Victory" thrilled every heart who heard. Dr. Zirenese told of the "Impact of Christianity on Non-Christian Religions." Sir Andrew Fraser described the "Good Work of Christian Missions in India." These are but a few of the great addresses delivered at the congress. There were distinguished laymen from the United States, the knowledge of whose golden deeds had preceded them and made their words welcome and weighty: men like Mr. L. H. Severance, of Cleveland, O.; Mr. Silas McBee, of New York, editor of The Churchman; Mr. J. B. Sleman, of Washington, D. C.; Hon. Joshua Levering, of Baltimore, Md.; Mr. C. A. Rowland, of Athens, Ga.; Hon. D. F. Wilber, United States Consul at Halifax, N. S.

The claims of the Orient had many advocates, but the needs of Canada were not forgotten: the great needs of our growing cities, the needs of the foreigners who are "sweeping in," creating conditions which Professor Osborne, of Winnipeg, Manitoba, says are "appalling." These were all carefully and tellingly brought home to and considered by the congress.

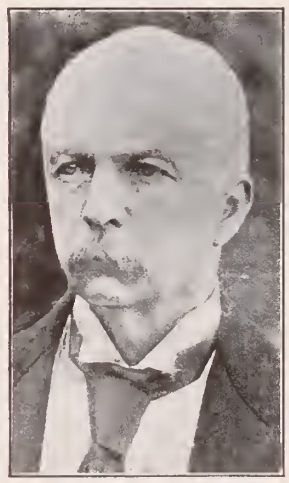
As a result, a great national policy has been planned and a national organization formed to carry it out. It is desired to carry the Laymen's Missionary Movement into every centre of the Dominion, to assist every individual congregation in reaching and maintaining its highest missionary efficiency; to press the use of methods of missionary education and finance found successful by the congress; to urge upon the whole Canadian Church the duty of evangelizing all who come to the shores of the Dominion; to prevent, as far as possible, denominational overlapping and also to provide for the adequate preaching of the Gospel to forty millions of souls in the non-Christian world. The following is, in part, the concluding section of the congress' statement of missionary policy:



Chairman N. W. Rowell



J. Campbell White



Sir Andrew Fraser

"That the following statement be adopted, as expressing the convictions of the congress with reference to the outstanding features of what may be called Canada's missionary policy.

"In view of the universality and finality of the Gospel of Christ, and of the spiritual needs of mankind, we believe that the Church of our generation should undertake to obey literally the command of Christ to preach the Gospel to every creature.

"According to their several ability and opportunity, we believe that the laymen of the churches are equally responsible with the ordained ministers to pray and to work for the coming of the kingdom of God upon earth.

"We believe that every Christian should recognize the world as his field, and to the full measure of his ability work for its evangelization.

"We recognize the clear duty of the churches of Canada to evangelize all those in the Dominion, or who come to our shores, who have not been led into the Christian life, and also to provide for the adequate preaching of the Gospel to forty millions of souls in the non-Christian world.

"Remembering that the promises of blessing are conditional upon obedience to the will of God, and recognizing the deep spiritual quickening which has already come to our churches through the awakening of the missionary spirit, we call upon the whole of the churches here represented to unite with us in discharging our personal and national missionary obligations.

"Assembled in the first National Missionary Congress of modern times, and deeply persuaded of the power of combined and co-operative Christianity to solve all the problems of human society, we desire to unite with the churches of our sister countries throughout Christendom as loyal servants of the King of Kings, in a comprehensive and adequate crusade for the winning of mankind to Jesus Christ, who is 'the Way, the Truth and the Life,' 'the Desire of nations,' and the 'Light of the world.'"

It is too soon and we are too near this great gathering to measure its influence or its full significance. Its influence upon the Christian laymen who have taken part in its sessions will be great. They will have a new sense of the greatness of Christ and no narrow views of his Church. Canada will feel the influence for good in every walk of life, and there must be new vitality in every department of church activity. The important cause of church union in Canada, which has been allowed to languish, will take new impetus. It will hasten the happy day when "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth."

us. We have known the comforting touch of Christ, the sense of a great sweetness and relief in the thought of Christ as though an unseen hand indeed poured cool balm into the wide, ragged wound the world had made. And we have known the painful hand of Christ, the finger of flame, moving across our souls, and writing dreadful things upon the wall of the chamber of the heart, the Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin of lost hopes. We have known the arresting touch of Christ, the quiet hand upon the shoulder, bidding us look up from the dust, where we groped for tinsel toys and gilded baubles, to the forgotten sublimities of human life. And yet we are not saved. The emotion of joy or pain has passed and we are very much what we were a dozen years ago. It is manifest, therefore, that something else is needed. And what is that something?

It is not only Christ's touch upon us, but our touch upon Christ. Christ's question is not, "Desirest thou to be saved?" but "Willest thou?"—for it is not by emotions, but by acts of the will, that life is changed. Christ has touched you, but dare you now touch Christ? The shepherd seeks the sheep, but will the sheep turn back? The voice of love finds the prodigal, but will the prodigal not only accept the assurance that in the Father's house there is bread enough and to spare, but say, "I will arise and go to my Father"?

Now look at this woman's story again, and you will see that it costs her a great deal to do what she did. It cost her ridicule. In that crowd how many were there ready to pour ridicule upon this persistent, intolerable woman, who would edge her way into the very centre of the throng where the Master was—an unwanted guest! But she bore the ridicule, and it was a light thing to bear for what she hoped to gain. It cost her effort. There was a great throng, we are told, and a poor woman in a great throng has very little chance, with her weak strength, of getting where she would be, to the presence of the Master. It cost her exposure. Every instinct of her nature counseled silence about that disease which had consumed her life. It cost her confession. She had to say at last, although she sought to avoid saying it, who she was and what she was, and why she was there and what her trouble was. Jesus would not let her touch him and go away. And ridicule, effort, exposure, confession all have their counterparts in our salvation. Some of you know what the ridicule means. And some of you know that if you are not saved it is because you have not made the effort. And some of you know that there is something in you concealed which you won't expose and which you won't confess, and that is the reason why, after all these years and all these acts of worship, you are no different from that which you were a dozen years ago. I have no time to discuss the ethics of confession. There may be cases where silence is justified, but of this I am very sure: that, in the great majority of cases, full, absolute, utter confession, and public confession, if needs be, is the price we have to pay for turning to Christ and receiving the balm of healing and the power of a new life. Put it how you may, be sure of this: you cannot come to Christ without cost, without something that will be a cross to you. Oh, if it were possible for others to save you, there are many who would do it. Moses was not alone when he prayed that he might be blotted out of the Book of Life, if by his destruction the people might be saved. Many a mother has said that for her son. If at a moment's notice, and without the slightest thought, save the brave first thought of the courageous heart, a man will plunge into a stream to save from drowning some one he does not know simply because the compulsion of kindness and of courage is upon him, am I assuming too much in saying that there are people who would die to save you? There are those who would lay down their lives in happy martyrdom to save the people; but it cannot be.

> From David's lips that word did roll—
> 'Tis true and living yet—
> No man can save his brother's soul,
> Nor pay his brother's debt.

It has to come to a personal question between ourselves and Christ, and the great question that this subject puts to us is whether we are willing to pay the price of redemption. Great stress has been laid, and rightly so, in all the Christian theologies on the price paid for our redemption in the shed blood of Christ; but we also have to pay a price. The price of ridicule—that is light; the price of exposure—that is not light; the price of public confession—that is terrible. But, if a man be in earnest, as this woman was, to touch the Master, no price will be counted too great.

Let me speak plainly to you for one moment, as I close. That which is keeping most men and women back from salvation is something in their own hearts, and they know it. The only people of whom I have ever despaired are those who will not acknowledge that they are sinners. With the smell of drink upon their lips, they tell me they do not drink; with the mark of vice upon their foreheads, they tell me they have no secret sin to confess; with the black facts of their life known to me, they speak as though there were no such black facts. Christ asks honesty, and unless we are honest with ourselves our salvation is impossible. His touch has still its healing power, but until we come to him with the heart that confesses the sin, even the touch of Christ cannot avail us. But if we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin.

A DAY IN THE NATION'S TREASURY

HOW OUR GOVERNMENT'S BIGGEST AND MOST IMPORTANT BRANCH IS CONDUCTED

Hon. C. H. Treat, U. S. Treasurer

The United States Treasury, Washington, D. C.

Chief Wilkie, of the Secret Service

By LYMAN BEECHER STOWE

THE government of the United States is the biggest corporation in the world. The Treasury Department is its biggest and most important branch. The government could not exist without the treasury any more than you could without food. During the four years of a single administration a sum equal to all the money in the country is received into and paid out of the United States Treasury. The material growth of our nation is measured by the volume of business done by the Treasury Department. To-day in less than one week more money is paid out of the treasury than was expended for an entire year during the first quarter century of the republic.

The Treasury Department employs about twenty-two thousand people. This treasury army, officers and privates, is distributed from Alaska to the Gulf of Mexico, from San Francisco to New York. About seven thousand are stationed at the headquarters of the department in Washington. The multifarious occupations of this army of workers cover as broad a field as its geographical distribution. There is scarcely an art, a science, a profession or a trade which is not represented in the Treasury Department. Walt Whitman, Eli Perkins, the humorist, John Burroughs, the nature poet, and William Douglas O'Connor, the novelist, were all at one time employed in the department.

Speaking generally, the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury fall under these three heads: The collection of the revenue of the United States; the expending of all moneys for the expenses of the national government; the maintenance of the stability of the monetary system of the nation. This embraces the management of our national debt, the national currency and coinage, the supervision of the national banks, the internal revenue, the customs, revenue cutter, life saving, public health and marine hospital services. To help him perform his hundred-headed task, the Secretary of the Treasury has three assistant secretaries, the treasurer of the United States, the comptroller of the currency, the commissioner of internal revenue, the register of the treasury, the comptroller of the treasury, and the chiefs of the some seventy divisions, besides the immense number of minor treasury officers and employees. Former Assistant Secretary Vanderlip, now an officer of the First National Bank of New York City, said of this organization, "I believe there is no organization in the commercial life of this country, look where you will, that is its superior; in many respects one will not find its equal."

In spite of his great power and the remarkable efficiency of the organization over which he presides, the secretary is little responsible for a treasury balance or deficit. This is because of the lack of co-ordination between the legislation affecting income and that affecting expenditure. The secretary submits his budget and his recommendations, and Congress follows his advice or not, as it sees fit. It usually does not see fit. For almost twenty years successive secretaries have tried to have certain useless expenses stopped. There are twelve customs districts, officered at an expense of $15,578.14, where the total year's income a few years ago was $275.26. Each dollar cost $56.59 to collect. One port has a collector at a salary of $1,800, where the total collections for a certain year were twenty cents. For this waste of money Congress, and not the Secretary of the Treasury, is responsible.

One of the greatest benefits resulting from the Civil War was the issuance of paper money by the United States. Carefully designed government notes superseded the motley multitudes of notes issued by private banks. It was practically impossible to tell whether these privately issued notes were genuine or not. Counterfeiting was an easy, profitable and comparatively safe occupation. For the manufacture of this paper money there has grown up in the Treasury Department the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. This is the largest manufacturing establishment under government control in the world. Here are employed about two thousand men and an equal number of women. In a single room, the plate engraving room, seven hundred men and women work. The pay roll is considerably over $3,000,000 a year. This bureau makes all the securities of the United States, from the internal revenue stamp, whose value is one-eighth of a cent, to the $50,000 government bond. It makes also all the postage stamps. During the year 1905 the bureau printed 5,789,213,985 notes. These placed end on end would have encircled the world four times and over. Since the output of the bureau increased 100 per cent. between 1900 and 1905, and has kept on increasing, it is probably safe to say that this year's output will be about 50 per cent. greater than that of 1905.

Destroying Money in the "Macerating" Room, Bureau of Engraving and Printing

The bureau is at the present time producing and delivering daily to the treasury $7,000,000 worth of negotiable paper, $3,000,000 of which is emergency currency issued in accordance with the terms of the Aldrich Act passed by the last Congress. The postage stamp output is now 28,000,000 daily. The foreman of the room in which the stamps are completed told me that he could gauge the prosperity of the country by the number of stamps called for daily. At times of acute depression it falls as low as 18,000,000. At times of greatest prosperity it rises as high as 36,000,000. According to this barometer business conditions have been materially improving during the last few months.

In the reserve stock room of the bureau there is at present $448,000,000 worth of negotiable paper. These notes placed end on end would girdle the globe more than two dozen times. There is also a standing reserve of $5,000,000 worth of postage stamps.

Mr. Ralph, the Director of the Bureau, said to me: "My people here, during their eight-hour working day, are under as strict guard as though they were in a penal institution. The building is surrounded by armed men. No employee can leave without a pass. He cannot get such a pass until his work has been checked and found correct. If there is a cent's worth of material missing it must either be found or replaced out of the employee's own pocket. They do not realize these restrictions, however. They feel themselves as free and work as contentedly as in any first-class factory.

"No one is trusted. No one is distrusted. There is a perfect checking system, so that the slightest mistake or misdeed can at once and infallibly be traced to the delinquent. All negotiable paper is counted fifty-two times—forty-six times here and six times at the treasury. We aim to make the work of such high grade both technically and artistically that it will be supremely difficult to counterfeit it. We insist upon absolute accuracy."

The counters work as though their fingers were driven by electric dynamos. There are four notes to a sheet. They range in value from one dollar to ten thousand dollars. The counters are all women. They must not only count, but detect imperfection of all varieties as they go along. The most expert sometimes counts and examines 37,000 sheets a day. When the sheets are flying under her fingers as fast as if driven by a high wind it is almost uncanny to see her, every now and again, stop and remove an imperfect sheet. When I inquired what was the matter with an apparently perfect sheet which she threw out she pointed to a blot, about one-thirty-second of an inch square, on the shield of the Goddess of Liberty. If you want to see human machines par excellence I advise you to visit the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

The paper which enters this Bureau comes out like the paper money which you see and use, with this exception: it lacks the government stamp. Until that is affixed at the Treasury, it is no more legal tender than is an ordinary sheet of note paper.

The completed product from the Bureau goes to the treasury to receive the government stamp, to be recounted, and issued to the country as legal tender. The Treasurer of the United States, as his title implies, is the official who receives and pays out all moneys. When Mr. Treat, the present treasurer, came into office July , 1905, the retiring treasurer, Mr. Roberts, turned over to him all moneys in the possession of the United States and received from him a receipt for them. They amounted to the sum of $1,259,598,278.58 2-3. During Mr. Roberts' eight years in office there had not been an error of a fraction of a mill. It took six counters six months to count this money. In the treasury to-day there is $1,028,233,371 in gold. There are also in the treasury and sub-treasuries 480,000,000 silver dollars. If placed in freight cars, 60,000 pounds to a car, they would fill a train of 480 cars.

Thirty days elapse between the delivery of each sheet of paper to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the time it comes from the Treasury in the form of negotiable paper ready for circulation. It took thirty days to make each dollar bill which you stick into your pocket, and a like time to make the $50,000 government bond which your banker puts into his vaults. The Crane Bros., of Dalton, Mass., make all the paper for the government securities of every description. This paper is guarded even more rigorously by Uncle Sam's Secret Service watchdogs than is the completed product—the actual money. They stand over it in the factory while it is being made. They guard it in transit from the factory to Washington. This paper is made by a secret process and only one counterfeiter has ever successfully imitated it. By a large bribe he lured one of the Crane Bros.' foremen into his employ. He was finally caught. Both he and the woman are now serving long terms in the penitentiary. In boxes weighing several hundred pounds each this paper is sent by mail from the mills to the Treasury. Just as "The king can do no wrong," so Uncle Sam can break his own laws. After it is made into money it is distributed by express and unguarded.

All the worn-out money, after it has passed through its innumerable hands, paid its quantities of debts, and done its share of good and evil, finds its way into the Redemption Division of the Treasury. Here it is first perforated by a punching machine, then cut in two by a great knife, and finally dissolved into pulp or macerated in great covered caldrons filled with boiling water. This macerating process must always be done before three high officials of the department as eye witnesses. The pulp is then sold to a paper factory for $44 a ton. Millions upon millions of one-time money sold for $44 a ton! To this division, too, people all over the country are perpetually sending charred and mutilated money to be replaced by new money. Mrs. A. E. Brown, in charge of this work, is the first expert of the world on partially destroyed money. Last year there came to her a small box containing tiny bits of money. The box was accompanied by a note from the sender stating that they represented the remains of $244, which had been gnawed by mice. The largest piece was not over a fourth of an inch in diameter. After several days' work Mrs. Brown succeeded in pasting them together. They made a perfect one dollar bill. Mrs. Brown showed me a small box of ashes she was then at work upon—the alleged remains of a banknote of a considerable denomination. She had already partially identified it. While I was talking with her a very grimy laborer appeared and handed in through the window piece by piece a very much subdivided dollar bill. Before he had fairly started on his voluable explanations Mrs. Brown had pieced it together and handed him a crisp new bill. He shoved it into his pocket with a grin of satisfaction and said, "Thank you kindly, lady. I thought sure me dollar was gone on me. It was three months since I done it, as I was tellin' ye, and I says to myself, 'What would the government be doing being bothered with one dollar?' an' so I never come round, but yesterday I spoke of it to me foreman an' he says, says he, 'Sure they'll give ye your dollar back just the same as if it was a $10,000 note.' I'm a good American, I am—bin in the country fifteen years, I have, an' it's a good country, an' good day to ye." And this is the only country in the world which gives new money for old to individuals.

Some of the receipts in the files of the Treasury Department would make collectors green with envy. Here is filed the account which George Washington kept with his own hand during the Revolution. It totals to over £16,000—over $82,000. This amount he paid out of his own pocket exclusive of his expenses for his family. He paid the expenses of his staff officers. He bought rations and ammunition for starving and unarmed troops. This was a great sum for those days. His chances of being reimbursed were problematical even in case of victory. This claim was about the three hundred and seventieth paid by order of Congress. He very likely received his money toward the close of his first Presidential term. The next receipt I came upon was that given by the Russian Ambassador for the $7,200,000 which we paid for Alaska. This is written in long hand on one sheet of note paper. Except for its excellent English, it is as simple as one which you might give for a package of laundry. This purchase was known as "Seward's Folly." There was a great procession held at the time with at its head a cake of ice inscribed with these words: "Seward's Folly—Price $7,200,000." Alaskan products amounted to $5,000,000 for the month of July, 1908, alone. Too bad Seward can't return to face his wiseacre critics of those days. Here also are the four Philippine receipts for $5,000,000 each. The two Panama receipts—one for $10,000,000 from the newly-born Republic of Panama, and one for $40,000,000 from the French Panama Company. The latter payment is the largest single voucher ever authorized by Congress and paid out of the Treasury.

In talking with Mr. Leach, the Director of the Mint, I very naturally mentioned the recent controversy over the omission of the motto, "In God We Trust," from the St. Gaudens coins—the controversy in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD took so prominent and successful a part. He said: "Although definitely specified in an earlier act of Congress no mention of the motto appeared in the revised coinage act of 1874. As this set aside the previous act Mr. St. Gaudens had no more right to use that motto than any other motto not specified in the act. His action did not indicate any personal preference. He would have exceeded his duty had he used it without authority.

"It may have been omitted in error from the Act of '74. Of course, we have no way of telling as to that. We expected at first to print only three or four thousand of the original coins with the motto omitted, but there was such a demand for them from collectors that we finally printed 12,000."

At the time of the San Francisco disaster the United States Mint was the only considerable fiscal institution saved. The buildings on all sides of it were burned and it was only by the most desperate fight that the great building, with its hundreds of millions of money, was rescued. Mr. Leach was at that time its director. He says, "I became for the time being the J. Pierpont Morgan of San Francisco. I was the financial dictator of the city because I was the only man who controlled large resources." Mr. Leach openly defied government regulations. He lent money to the army, the navy and all other branches of the government service there represented. He invited the discomfited bankers to set up improvised banking offices in the mint building. He lent them large amounts of money, on their credits with the government, to do business with. By so doing he prevented absolute business prostration in the desolated city. The fact that he was shortly after promoted to his present position shows that it is sometimes considered as wise and patriotic to break regulations as it is usually to keep them.

The Secret Service is the branch of the Treasury Department which attracts writers much as a lamp attracts moths. The public has been provided with reams of misinformation about it. No writer can say much about it and say it truthfully for this excellent reason: There are only three men in the United States who know much about it, and they

The Sunday Saloon Bill Killed

THE Committee of Fourteen of New York City introduced into the Legislature a bill permitting saloons to be opened from one to eleven o'clock P.M., in cities of the first class in New York, on the Sabbath. The bill had features which it was supposed would win the favor of enough church people to carry the Sunday opening clause, which the brewers have contended for so constantly and earnestly. In this they failed. No doubt the members of the Committee of Fourteen were sincerely desirous of promoting the public welfare; but they were misguided in their judgment and did not take into account the moral sense of the city as well as of the State. While a few ministers were deceived by the proposition of Sunday opening in the interest of the liquor dealers, it is likely that eight-tenths of the ministers of New York City and the great interests they represented, as well as nine-tenths of the ministers in the State at large and their congregations, were unalterably opposed to the measure.

The friends of the bill claimed that it would reduce the number of Raines Law hotels, but these hotels are saloons with disorderly-room attachments, one-half of which, according to the report of the Committee of Fourteen, had already been abolished without the benevolent help of any Sunday opening law. Besides, the Raines Law hotels are the result of the infraction, and not the permission, of the present Raines Law, which, if properly enforced, will wipe out almost all of these vile institutions that still remain. Furthermore, the brewers could, by simply determining to do so, dry up every Raines Law hotel. It is likely that a number of these places are virtually owned by the brewers, as they could not exist a week without their supplies and support; yet the brewers have been pleading for the Sunday opening of saloons as a cure for the evils of their own trade, when they would only have to say the word themselves and the vile lawlessness would cease.

The way to reduce the number of Raines Law hotels, to stop Sunday selling, to put an end to graft at once and effectually, is to enforce the law which is already on the statute books. The statement that this is impossible is not true. It is impossible, with the present collusion of saloonkeepers and political leaders, and with the moral cowardice of those who are entrusted with the enforcement of law.

Fortunately this bill, after an important hearing at Albany, on April 13, was killed in the Senate Committee. This demand of the saloon for a part or all of Sunday has been going on in many States and cities of the Union, and it is this insult to the moral sense of the people, Catholic as well as Protestant, as much as anything else, which has aroused the indignation of the people and prompted them to forbid the sale of liquor during week days, as well as on the Sabbath, among one-half of the population of the country.

Making Bread Dearer

EVEN in this age of unusually reckless and immoral speculation, we seldom witness so flagrant a case of dangerous gambling as that of the recent "wheat corner" in Chicago. That any one man or group of men should have the power to seize control of one of the principal staples of life and to force it by adroit manipulation up to a purely artificial price and make a profit of millions out of the necessities of their fellow-beings, might well be regarded as inconceivable, were it not for the fact that we have had in the past "corners" in oil, cotton, flour, corn, beef, eggs and practically all of the necessaries of daily existence. These "corners" make a tremendous drain upon the resources of the people, who are entirely at the mercy of the unscrupulous commercial pirates engaged in the schemes. The speculator who secures control of the market raises the price of the commodity by successive advances to a point where he has other holders helpless and at a standstill. He arbitrarily fixes the price of the commodity to suit himself, with none to hinder. Apparently he has no moral sense of wrongdoing; he is simply "bulling" the market for the benefit of his own pocket, and though a thousand others be forced into bankruptcy and multitudes suffer as the result of his inordinate greed, he glories in the power that enables him to inflict such injuries and at the same time make them yield a big profit. He fixes the price at which the farmer shall sell his wheat to the miller; the miller in turn raises the price at which he sells to the baker; the baker raises his price to the grocer, the restaurant-keeper and the householder and the general consumer at last is compelled to bear the whole burden of the exorbitant increase, since each of the middlemen saves his own pocket, on the principle of laying the full weight of the load upon "the man lower down." Thus it is the poor man and his family, after all, who are the real victims of the unscrupulous king of the "corner."

There is apparently no law in existence under which the offender who creates the "corner" can be prosecuted. A storm of protest has arisen all over the country, and Congress will no doubt take legislative action with that purpose in view. Let us hope that it will be drastic and absolutely prohibitive of "corners" in any of the country's food products in the future.

The Ills of Working Women

PROFESSOR ULYSSES G. WEATHERLY, of the University of Indiana, has recently delivered an address before the American Sociological Society in which he is said to advocate the setting aside of certain occupations exclusively for women, on the ground that many lines of business are injurious to the sex and that woman should monopolize those for which she is fitted.

This hardly accords with the American idea of freedom. To bar out from these occupations men who might have a talent for them, or to bar out women from any occupation for which certain special ones might have a marked gift, would seem to be carrying "paternalism" to an extreme.

Another new deduction of Professor Weatherly is that married women who earn their own money (he would doubtless apply the same strange rule to unmarried women also) are less likely to spend it economically than are those who do not work outside the home. This is probably the first time in the world's history that such a view has been advanced. It has always been said that whoever earns can best spend.

The disparity between the pay of men and women is due, in this gentleman's opinion, to "the lack of a serious professional spirit and of organization." In many cases, this disparity in wages has been proven to be due to the women's lack of political influence.

The Rush of Immigration

ACCORDING to the forecasts of our immigration authorities, the influx from foreign lands this summer will probably be the largest ever known. Italy and Russia lead in this great human tidal wave. There are few more inspiring sights than to witness a great ocean liner, crowded to the rails with gazing foreigners, slowly and majestically steaming up through the Narrows and past the Liberty statue. Already New York has touched the record mark this year of ten thousand arrivals in a day, and this promises to be eclipsed. It is likely that the season's record will go far beyond the million. The problem of the absorption of such huge masses of alien population is a serious one. Even with all our safeguards, it is not always an easy matter to sift out the undesirables; but that the vast majority of these new comers are such as will ultimately become good American citizens is beyond dispute. It is a mistake to imagine, as some apparently do, that our government is unwisely opening the door to all classes, good, bad and indifferent. Immigrant supervision was never so rigid as it is to-day, and the numbers of aliens deported grows larger instead of smaller every year. Vigilant watch over immigration is maintained by our officials at the ports of departure, as well as at every American seaport, and there is now less chance than ever of the undesirables passing successfully through the ordeal of official investigation, which is now so thorough that it quickly sifts them out and shuts the gate against the worthless, the incapable, the criminal and the professional disturber of the peace of society.

Wasted Years

FROM Los Angeles, Calif., comes a strange, weird story of a mining prospector, an aged Englishman, who, for fifteen years, has lived the life of a recluse on the deserts of Arizona and Nevada. During that entire period he saw no book or newspaper. He was so completely absorbed in the hunt for gold that the whole world and its affairs were utterly forgotten. Friends, home, and all that one usually holds dear, were to him as if they had no existence. He had not heard of the death of Queen Victoria; the name of Theodore Roosevelt meant nothing to him, and the Boer and Spanish-American wars had come and gone while he burrowed in the earth for gold. This extreme instance of the gold madness is probably without a parallel. The man had foolishly sacrificed a large part of his life for nothing. He has his counterpart in thousands of men in our busy marts of trade, who make themselves slaves to the business of money-making to the exclusion of almost all that gives real, enduring value to life. They grasp at the shadow and lose the substance. However great their wealth, they are poor indeed by contrast with those who have enriched their lives by the cultivation of those qualities of character that make for a full, rounded manhood, with its generous helpfulness toward others, its ties of affection, its elevating friendships and its ennobling sacrifice and self-denial.

A Beneficent Gift

THE charities of rich women are remarkable not only for generosity, but for the practical and humane ends they are intended to serve. The elder Mrs. Vanderbilt, it is learned, has recently given a million dollars for the erection of model tenements in New York City, where tuberculous families can be accommodated in comfort. The buildings will afford ample quarters for the housing of four hundred families, and will cover an area of eighteen city lots. The whole enterprise will be under the care of the Presbyterian Hospital. At present the tuberculosis clinic has under inspection and care one thousand tuberculous families in New York City. Mrs. Vanderbilt's gift is significant of the spirit of modern times. Where once plagues devastated the earth and deadly diseases were borne on the four winds, we now fight pestilence by the aid of science, hygiene, fresh air and absolute cleanliness.

The white plague, as consumption has well been called, is far less a menace to the general public than it was in the last century. Annually we are learning how to limit its increase, and by means within reach of most families to suppress its contagion. As whether richer or poorer, we are interdependent so cially, and as poison in a downtown tenement ma easily mean peril in an uptown palace, no membe of the body politic can afford to neglect or ignore th spread of disease in any locality. New York owe its thanks to Mrs. Vanderbilt for her noble gift.

Young Turks Overthrown

THE Young Turks who led such a powerful revolt last summer against the Sultan and his absolute monarchy, have themselves been hurled from power by the same army that elevated them. One or two of the wisest leaders of the young party, after signal services to the state, dropped out of the ranks, and the responsibilities of government fell upon the shoulders of leaders whose heads were swelled with conceit and many of whose plans were unwise. The loss of Turkish territory, their failure to keep the friendship of the army, not even paying the wages of the soldiers regularly, and their inability to retain their hold upon the Mohammedan religionists, provoked the revolution of April 13, which expressed itself in the surrounding of the Parliament House by thousands of mutinous Turkish soldiers, demanding the deposition of the Cabinet headed by Hilmi Pasha, and driving out of power the ministry and the Committee of Union and Progress. The League of Mohammed, backed by the rank and file of the whole of the First Army Corps and a large majority of the Moslem populace, united in the assault on the Parliament. They were entirely successful, and Tewfik Pasha was appointed as Prime Minister and Edhem Pasha as Minister of War. Several persons were killed and wounded in the assault. The Cabinet met early in the morning and, after a long consultation, the ministers sent in their resignations to the palace. The Sultan may have had little or much to do with this revolution, but it must have pleased him to see the young revolutionists who unhorsed him become so soon unhorsed themselves, and as he was very tactful then in yielding a Constitution and a Parliament on the demands of his people, so now he seems just as tactful in adjusting himself to the demands of the revolutionists. While still loyal to the constitutional form of government, he takes the reins of his sovereign authority with a new grip and amidst the enthusiasms of his people. But a nation which, like Turkey, is at the mercy of its army, and can be made either a limited monarchy or an absolute despotism at its will, is in a very precarious condition and its ruler is in no way to be envied. It is claimed that the murder of Hassan Fehmi Effendi, editor of a Liberal newspaper, on April 7, which provoked such violent demonstrations in Parliament, started the revolution. On April 18 the revolutionists were reported as ready to attack the capital, and the fate of the Constitution hung in the balance. People have to get used to their new right of liberty, and Turkey is only doing that which almost all constitutional governments do in their first years—quarreling, fighting and shedding blood before the two systems adjust themselves to each other. These differences of opinion and sentiment are employed by the divine Ruler in the betterment of mankind and in the establishment of Christ's kingdom.

He looseth the bond of kings, and girdeth their loins with a girdle. He leadeth princes away spoiled, and overthroweth the mighty. (Job 12 : 18, 19.)

Automobile and Good Roads

The automobile has passed its experimental stage and has come to stay, and the roads of our country will have to make ready for it. Systematic plans are being laid, and millions of money are being and will be expended in preparing the roads of the country for the new vehicle. These macadamized highways will not only afford avenues for the swift and costly car of the rich man, but will no doubt be utilized by the farmers generally before very long in carrying their produce to market. Enough people are practically interested in the demands for these improvements to secure prompt and generous appropriations from State and National Legislatures. We are said to be behind many of the nations of Europe in the character of our roads, but our country is enormously rich and thoroughly enterprising when aroused. The First National Good Roads and Legislative Convention, called by the American Automobile Association, co-operated in by the National Grange, the American Road-makers' Association and the entire automobile industry, was held in Buffalo last July, and has had its good effects and will be followed by another one to be held this year, which will still further promote this great enterprise of road betterment and building. The construction of new dirt roads and railroads, the increase of travel and of communication one with another, seems to be a part of the plan of Providence to promote the material, as well as the mental, moral and religious welfare of the inhabitants of the world.

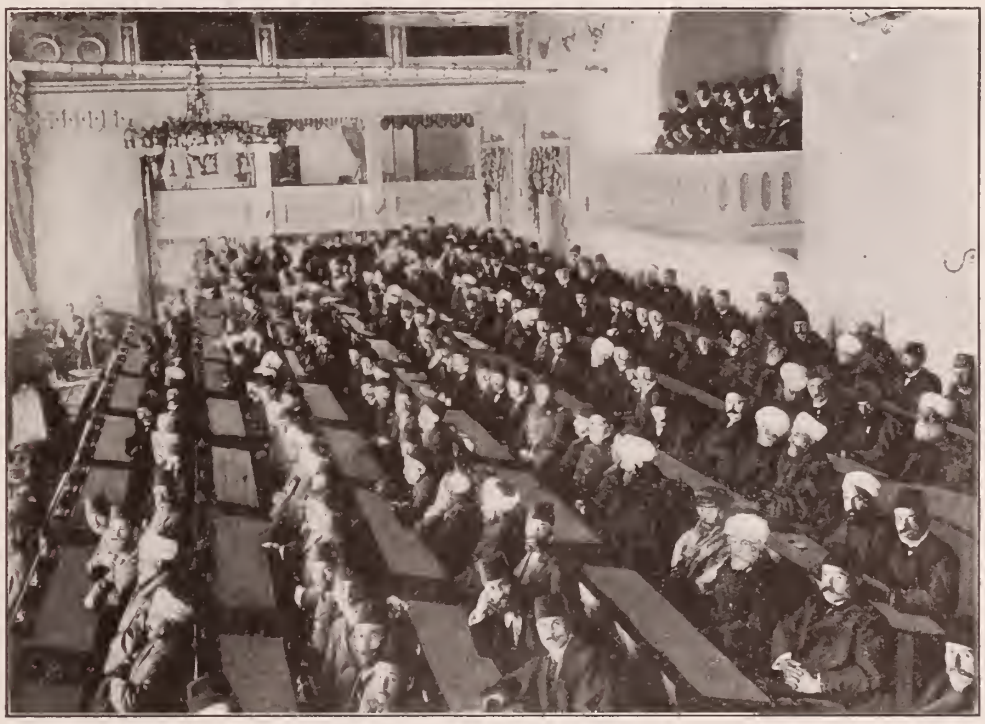
Six Generations Celebrate Woman's Birthday

Mrs. Anna Pass, of Wilmington, Del., recently celebrated the one hundredth anniversary of her birth. During the celebration a photograph was taken of her descendants who were present. Faces representing six generations appeared in the picture.



The New Turkish Parliament in Session

Seated on the arm of the aged woman's chair was Gletas Finnan, fifteen months old, her great-great-great-grandchild. To the right of the child in the picture was Mrs. Elizabeth David, daughter of the centenarian. To the left was Mrs. Anna Sayers, the granddaughter; standing in the rear was Mrs. Lucy McDade, a great-granddaughter, and behind the baby was Mrs. Gletas Finnan, a great-great-granddaughter. Mrs. Pass retains her memory in a most remarkable manner and entertained her guests with the recital of incidents which had happened in the first quarter of the last century. She remembers the visit of Lafayette to the United States in 1824, when she was a girl of seventeen, and the great rejoicing of the people in honor of the Frenchman who so befriended the Colonies. She recalls vividly the trial of the first steam railroad that ever ran in America, and can describe in detail the inauguration to the Presidency of John Quincy Adams, an event which she witnessed.

We have feelings of sublimity as we behold a tree which has looked down upon the birth and death of many generations, or upon an ancient castle in which tragedies have been enacted that have made the nations' history. Some such feelings we have as we look upon this woman's life, which has witnessed the birth and death of three generations, in which have been enacted so many tragedies. Nineteen such lives as this, standing in line, would touch the hand of Christ. This long life has been wide and deep, made so by the truths and the loves that have been crowded into it. This is a beautiful picture in our national life, this aged saint, with six generations gathered around her. An intelligent and consecrated motherhood is the measure of our national strength and glory.

The aged women likewise, that they be in behavior as becometh holiness. (Titus 2 : 3.)

Eagle and Man Fight for a Baby

Peter Johnson, a farmer living near St. Charles, Ill., had a desperate fight with an eagle and at last captured him. The eagle undertook to carry away Johnson's baby boy, and the father got on the scene just in time to save the little fellow's life. It was a struggle such as he had never before encountered; but he was nearly frantic at the thought of his child's peril, and fought with all his energy to overcome the bird. Several times the issue was in doubt, but he conquered at last. The fight continued two hours, and before it was finished at least a score of persons, who had come from his and neighboring houses, had participated in the conflict, using pitchforks, clubs and stones. Johnson himself was badly lacerated and bruised in the encounter, but the little boy luckily was unhurt. There is no quicker way to the heart of parents than the tender treatment of their children, and there is no swifter way of stirring animosities and conflicts of parents than an attempt to do injury to their offspring. There are hungry eagles that are trying to carry away the children, and there are faithful parents who are fighting them to the death.

So fight I, not as one that beateth the air. (I. Cor. 9 : 26.)

Giant Out of a Job

George Corday, who stands six feet nine inches in his stocking feet, has been making a scant living touring England in side-show performances, where a few pennies were charged for a look at the giant. He landed in this country in the steerage of the Cunarder Lucania, and is now looking for a job somewhere. Getting money out of the curiosity of the people is not immoral, but it is a very low grade of life employment as compared with a calling where positive values are laid down of body, mind or soul, and if he shall only get a good honest job, and render an equivalent for his wages, he will be a happier and more useful man. There are so many giants in society; people who are really taller than their fellow-men, in the native endowments of true manhood and womanhood, who are loafing on an easy job instead of putting their energies to some practical and successful employment.

Six days thou shalt labor. (Deut. 5 : 13.)

A Book "Beyond Praise"

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Your mounted pictures arrived safely yesterday. They are splendid, but the premium book, After Death—What? is beyond praise. It is beautiful, helpful and comforting.

Yours very truly, MRS. S. H. BUTCHER.

How "Farthest South" Was Reached

The Landing Party Near the Hut

Lieutenant Shackleton and Captain Scott

Mountains of Rock in a Sea of Ice

SINCE the sixteenth century the eyes of voyagers and explorers have turned, as if fascinated, toward the arctic regions. First, they wanted to discover the northwest passage; then they tried to reach the North Pole. Consequently, when it was announced that at the other side of the earth Lieutenant Shackleton, a young British naval officer, was about to set sail for the utmost limit of land in the antarctic, to which but few had gone before, and with automobiles and sledges attempt to make a dash across the ice pack, over the mountains, and reach the South Pole, the entire world was interested. The party sailed in October, 1908. There was the long silence at first which always follows the disappearance of the hardy explorer into the unknown, and then came the report that, though Shackleton had not reached the South Pole, he had got within one hundred and eleven miles of it.

The ship anchored at Cape Royds, near the base of Mount Erebus, the great volcano on Ross Island. Here the lieutenant made his base, and from this point he started, with a party of three others and a supporting party, on a journey of 1,708 miles, which occupied 126 days, and was to reach a point 354 miles nearer the South Pole than had been reached by the expedition of the Discovery in 1901-04. Lieutenant Shackleton had been an officer in the expedition of 1901, so that the ground to be traversed first was known to him. He found then that the dogs used to draw the sledges usually succumbed to the hardship of climate and poor food, so he substituted ponies, and had a motor car, which could be converted into a sledge. Instead of the heavy furs in which one usually pictures the explorer of cold climates, he dressed the expedition in woolen, fur gloves being worn.

They passed Hut Point, where the Discovery had wintered. At White Island the party divided, Shackleton going on with three men, leaving the reserves. They went on alone. They had provisions for ninety days. A blizzard came on and they had to go into camp for several days at latitude 79.62 and longitude 168 east, and then dig themselves out.

A Chasm in the Great Ice Barrier

They reduced the amount of their daily rations. The march was over the most difficult ground. In places the snow was so soft that the ponies sank the length of their legs, and were got out with the greatest difficulty. Then they clambered over rocks and mountains of snow and ice. Finally, one of the ponies was shot, and a cache or depot of biscuit, pony meat and oil was made, some of the meat being taken with them. They had started in October, and on November 26 passed the "farthest south point" of the Discovery's party. They had found, previously, a cache made by the Discovery party, and appropriated it to help out their supply.

Two of the ponies were seized with snow blindness, and shot. They were at last confronted with a great mountain barrier. This was crossed, but the last pony fell through a crevasse, nearly taking one man with him. The men now hauled the loads, 250 pounds for each. One depot after another was made, all except one sledge was abandoned, and with rations reduced to twenty ounces per man daily they pushed on through a blizzard. The men grew weak from lack of sufficient food, but they stuck to their task, and at latitude 88.23, longitude 162 east, they hoisted the Union Jack, which had been given them by the Queen.

They could go no farther. The return journey was filled with perils, the men fell sick. Time and again the food gave out, and they marched, starving, until they reached a cache. One man became very ill toward the end of the return trip. One remained with him, while Shackleton and one other reached the ship and sent back a party, who brought them in.

LITTLE CHATS WITH OUR JUNIOR AGENTS

Miriam Sensenig

Pauline R. Sensenig

Carol R. Sensenig
Philadelphia, Pa.

IN order to keep in closer touch with our Junior Agents, we want to have little weekly chats with you and, in this way, we may be able, now and then, to give you helpful advice, or good suggestions, that will help you to sell more papers, make more money and earn bigger prizes.

But, to make this department really, truly "chats," we must not do all the talking ourselves. Nor do we want to. We are so proud of the many enthusiastic letters that come to us from our Boys and Girls that we mean to print as many as we can so that you may all see how other Junior Agents in other parts of the country are succeeding in selling THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and how they work.

We are not only proud of these letters, but we are proud to have THE CHRISTIAN HERALD represented by so many manly looking boys and bright, attractive girls, and so we are glad to publish their pictures, too, as often as our limited space will permit.

The letter from Max Taylor (on the right) winds up by saying, "Any boy should be willing to work for a paper so liberal and obliging." And to this we might add that any boy who works "with a will" like "Max," and any girl who has the enthusiasm and perseverance shown by our "Carol," "Pauline" and "Miriam" Sensenig (on the left) will be sure to make a success and earn many of our fine premiums in addition to a nice weekly income.

There is no downing a boy or girl who is determined to succeed and who knows how to stick to a resolution. The thing is, do not get discouraged if you cannot make as big a success at the beginning as you had hoped to. Remember that to do any thing well takes time. You did not learn to skate, or to swim, or to play ball in a day. Try first to sell a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD each week to your neighbors, family friends and members of your church and Sunday School who are not already among our subscribers, and then call on as many other people as you are able to or sell the paper in the streets. Many of our agents find that it pays them to get some other boy or girl to help, allowing the assistant a commission for the work.

Our little Philadelphia girls write us: "Some of our customers, after reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for ten weeks, have agreed to subscribe for a year"—and there is a point to keep in mind: encourage people to become regular subscribers. Our Premium Book tells you how easy it is to earn BIG REWARDS by securing yearly subscriptions; and the more people you can get to subscribe the more time you will have to go after new customers.

If you have anything interesting to tell us about your own work, or any questions you would like to ask, let us hear from you. Always address:

THE STORY OF MARCO

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters" and "The Transformation of Margaret"

MARCO FERDINANDO BONELLI—otherwise, "Bonesy"—peered cautiously through the underbrush at the mouth of the cave, and then stepped out into the sunlight.

Below him a hill fell away in a sheer descent of three hundred feet to a little clearing, where a wide area of trampled grass around a small gray tent told of a much larger encampment earlier in the day. With a half-stifled cry, the boy tightened his grasp on a battered violin-case in his hand, and plunged through the underbrush to where a stony path led by a devious way to the foot of the hill. Some minutes later he bounded into the clearing and began softly to approach the tent. He had almost reached it, when, as if the idea had suddenly come to him, he stopped and opened his violin-case. A moment later a weird, curious melody broke the silence of the clearing.

Almost instantly at the door of the tent appeared a woman, blue-eyed, fair-haired, and with two vivid red spots on otherwise colorless cheeks.

"Marco, why, Marco! what does this mean?" she cried.

The boy did not reply; but the music lost its minor wail and burst suddenly into a pæan of triumphant runs and double-stopping—which, after all, was more eloquent than any words could have been.

"But, Marco, my son," cried the woman again; "why did you come back?"

This time the music stopped. The boy smiled exultingly, and lowered his violin.

"I didn't go," he retorted.

"Didn't go! Where were you?"

"Up there." He jerked his thumb toward the hidden cave.

"But, Marco, they hunted everywhere for you. They thought you'd gone ahead. I was frightened!"

The boy's face changed. All the brightness fled from it and left it suddenly old and troubled. He frowned angrily.

"I didn't mean to scare you," he protested; "but I heard 'em talk about goin' an' leavin' you. As if I'd do that!"

The woman sighed, and dropped on to a low stool near the tent door. She began to cough painfully, and it was some minutes before she found her breath to speak again. Meanwhile the boy watched her, his young eyes deep and troubled.

"But, dearie, I'm going—right along—soon, too," she panted.

"All right. I'll go—then; but I won't leave you now—like them!" His lips snapped together over the last word, and his stormy eyes sought the grassy lane that led to the highway, down which that morning had disappeared the hurrying, thronging, gesticulating band of gipsies.

"But they had to go, Marco," protested the woman, feebly. "The townspeople would not let them stay."

There was a long silence. The boy was sitting now at the woman's feet, his fingers idly caressing the satiny smoothness of his violin.

"Mumsey," he asked abruptly, "be you a gipsy?"

"No, but I married one."

"Where is he—dad?"

A sudden flame leaped to the woman's eyes.

"I don't know," she answered.

The boy changed his position. Something in his mother's face did not encourage further questioning, and after a moment he picked up his bow and began to play softly.

Over in the west the sun dropped behind the hills, and only the tree-tops showed a golden glow. The grass became a deeper, more vivid green, and the shadows grew darker under the trees, while even into the boy's playing crept a touch of the twilight hush.

"In the long twilight they sat out under the sky"

Gradually the angry light faded from the woman's eyes. It was quite gone when she finally lifted her head and dragged herself to her feet.

"Come, come, Marco, it's supper time. They left me food—plenty of it—to last a week; and long before that I'll be well enough to follow them. Then we'll go; won't we? Why, Marco, I'm better already!" she finished, with the optimism so often accompanying the disease which paints treacherous roses on its victim's cheeks.

The boy stopped playing. His eyes were wistful. For a moment he did not speak; then he sighed:

"Mumsey, wouldn't it be just perfect, if only Flossie was here?"

The woman caught her breath sharply.

"They wouldn't leave her, anyhow, and they didn't think they'd left you," she almost sobbed. "They said I couldn't take care of 'kids'—as if my children could trouble me! Besides, I'm better, Marco; why, I'm lots better! I was almost well enough to go with them to-day."

"'Course you're better," declared Marco, stoutly, as he followed his mother into the tent.

In the long twilight they sat again out under the sky, and watched the stars appear one by one, and the great moon raise its golden disk above the tree-tops. They talked, too—at least, Marco talked; and he drew a glowing picture of all the good things that were to come to his "little mumsey," when he should be a man. Then he took up his violin and began to play; and into the runs and trills and dreamy melodies he put his castle in Spain—his great house, full of music and flowers and bowing servants, in the midst of which would walk his mother, in a silken gown of blue, and with a chain of gold and diamonds about her neck.

CHAPTER II

A Strolling Violinist

THE town of Gaylordville quite plumed itself on its victory, when it saw the scowling band of gipsies break camp and disappear over the top of the hill. For some weeks they had occupied the little clearing just off the main road—too many weeks, the town authorities said. It was not sanitary, nor safe, they declared; and they openly laid at the gipsies' door several petty thefts that had occurred. But scarcely had Gaylordville drawn its long breath of relief, when it suddenly awoke to the fact that its troubles were by no means over—the gipsies were not gone, after all. There still remained a sick woman and a nine-year-old boy.

The discovery was made thus:

Two days after the band of vagrants had dropped out of sight behind the hill, there appeared on the Gaylordville streets an undersized, lean-faced boy, with somber, dark eyes, and hair that hung in black curls all about his ears and neck. In his hand was a violin; and before one of the houses on the street he stopped and began to play.

He had played scarcely a dozen notes when at the house door appeared a woman with an angry frown on her face, and with an upraised hand to send the boy about his business. The hand, however, fell impotently at her side, and the frown disappeared from her face, while in the doorway she stood motionless, listening.

From all directions hurried a swarm of men, women and children, jeering, pushing, and gleefully shrieking: "Hi, look at de kid wid de fiddle!" But gradually the shouts died into silence, and only the rise and fall of a curiously weird melody broke the hush. Then the boy stopped playing, and smiled. The next moment he stood, hat in hand, before the woman in the doorway.

She started as if awakening from sleep. The frown returned to her brow.

"Ho, so ye want money, do ye?" she snapped. "Well, who are ye, anyhow? Where do ye come from?"

"I'm Marco Ferdinando Bonelli, ma'am," bowed the boy; "and I come from over the hills and far away."

"Well, you can go back over the hills and far away, then, fur all me," retorted the woman; but a jeering voice from the crowd interposed.

"Why, it's Bonesy — Bonesy, de gipsy kid!"

The boy turned angrily. His cheeks burned red, and his eyes blazed with a fire that told of an ancestry bred to fight its battles to the finish.

IN SMILING SPRING DAYS

What Shall We Wear?

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE question, What shall we wear on a given occasion, a ceremonial function or simply at home? is one of importance to women, and it argues no weakness or vanity on their part that they give it thoughtful attention. In the present day a woman may wear what she chooses, provided she can pay for it, and the immigrant lately landed soon abandons her peasant dress in favor of an approach to the costumes she sees worn by the women of America. No sumptuary laws interfere with the freedom of a woman's choice of material or cut, although naturally rich women are able to expend more money and to have larger variety in the matter of toilet than their poorer neighbors.

The cost of dress in early Colonial days far exceeded that of to-day, and the husbands of fair dames in Virginia and Massachusetts were tranquilly presented with bills for jackets, hoods and petticoats greatly in excess of the most extravagant accounts rendered by our dressmakers and milliners. Lace, embroidery and gold thread, jeweled buckles, shimmering velvets and stiff brocades helped to accentuate the value of a gentlewoman's wardrobe in the early settlement of this country. It is a little curious to note that during the last three years fashionable dressmakers in Paris and New York have copied almost exactly, in behalf of their patrons, the costumes of the seventeenth century.

Returning to our question, What shall we wear? as we are altogether at our own disposal and not trammeled by any orders from the magistrate or the council, as our forebears used to be, it behooves us to select clothing that befits our purse, our business and our social standing. If possible, a woman should be suitably dressed for the work or the recreation that she has in hand. If she is walking out on a rainy day, tramping over a muddy road, climbing a mountain or going on a shopping excursion in crowded streets, her skirts should clear the ground, her jacket be severe and her headgear very simple.

For visiting and receiving, for attendance at a dinner or a golden wedding, for a wedding in one's own home, and for every affair of pleasure, beautiful and possibly brilliant dress is in order, much depending on a lady's age. For church, simplicity in dress is desirable, as it seems hardly decorous to wear in the Lord's house garments that may discourage the coming thither of one's poorer sisters.

The most marked changes in feminine attire are usually discernible in sleeves. During several seasons short sleeves have been popular, and in winter's cold as well as summer's heat matrons and maidens have worn them, at first timidly as an innovation and latterly with delight on account of their comfort and convenience. Just as every one has been converted to a belief in the short sleeve, Fashion will probably decree that elbow lengths are absurd and sleeves will come down to the wrist. Sometimes sleeves are enormously puffed at the shoulder, again they droop with great fulness and much inconvenience at the forearm, now they are long and tight, again they are short and loose; to-day they are braided and slashed, to-morrow they will be close and opaque. But let them be what they may, the answer to what shall we wear will probably be, we shall wear whatever is the fashion.

The Good-by Kiss

People who love one another, and who are separating in the morning, one to go to the work of the day, the other to tarry by the stuff, should not forget the little ceremony of the morning kiss. Not one of us can surely tell what surprise of accident or casualty may be lurking between morning and evening, and every parting, however brief, should be in kindness and affection. The friction born of misunderstanding, the hurt that comes from angry words, the transient bitterness that poisons memory, have no place in ideal home life. Ought not the ideal to be the influence that fills the actual life with beauty and sweetness? Never forget the loving word or the good-by kiss in the morning.

The German Empress, Princess Victoria and Prince Joachim

THE Kaiser's household in the Fatherland has for its presiding genius a woman, beautiful, simple and sincere, a model of wifely virtues and domestic tastes, herself a fine example of the German wife and mother at her best. The Princess Victoria is her only daughter and youngest child, a great favorite with the Kaiser, and the petted darling of the imperial palace. Following a band of royal brothers, the little princess received the warmest of welcomes and is to-day the idol, not only of her mother, but of Germany.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—WANTED: INFORMATION. Can any reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD tell Aunt Prudence and her correspondent where to find the whole of a poem that begins:

What the clock says when it strikes two:
Love God, little one, for God loves you.

When it strikes three:
Suffer little children to come unto Me.

—MOURNING CUSTOMS. If you are not wearing mourning there is no reason why you should not attend any social gathering which you would enjoy, within a few weeks after a death in your family. People wearing crepe are not supposed to go into society, to concerts, etc., during the first six months. My own opinion is that it is more sincere and therefore more correct to follow one's own inclination in this matter, than to be bound by arbitrary rules. A widow wears deep mourning for one year.

Father's Place in the Home

SO much is said and written about the influence of mothers that we sometimes seem to forget how much a father means to his family, and how important a part he has in the bringing up of his children. The man has laid upon him the task of providing for the material wants of those who depend upon him, and during week days he sees little of his children by daylight. All day long he toils that there may be food on the table, shoes for little feet, fuel for the fire and the shelter of the roof. As a rule, husbands and fathers ask little for themselves in comparison with what they give, gladly and willingly, for the happiness of those they love. There are, of course, selfish men, grudging men, dissipated men in every community, and they set bad examples to their households and count for little except as such in the education of their children. These are, fortunately, in the minority, the vast majority of men with us rejoicing to do their duty, to spend and be spent, to ease the burdens laid upon the wife and mother, and to build up their homes in beauty and strength.

When a man's latchkey turns in the door at night and the children run to meet him with a glad shout of, "Here's father!" when the baby climbs to his shoulder and the little toddler hangs fast to his coat, when the tall daughter gives him a kiss and the small boy can hardly wait to tell him about the game or the school test, no other evidence is needed to show that a father is the bulwark of the home. How the small child loves to nestle against her father's breast, how quickly the baby learns to turn her little arms in his direction! What a pity it is when the mother mistakenly saves up the story of the children's derelictions to pour it out in the ears of a tired man who is thus forced to appear to his children simply as the one who punishes them for wrongdoing, instead of the one who praises them when they do right! While it is well that the father should be the court of last appeal, and that his authority should never be questioned, it robs him and the home of both love and sweetness if his children think of him with fear and dread his return at nightfall.

A beautiful story is told of a father who felt obliged to punish an only son for some transgression by sending him to sleep for a week in a room remote from the rest of the house. The boy, who had always been near his parents and who had never gone to bed without a kiss, was crying in the darkness by himself when the door softly opened and his father came in. "I cannot take away your punishment," he said, "but, my dear boy, I will share it!"

A father's unbending integrity, his straightforwardness of character and his reverence for God make deep impressions on his children. If he is uniformly polite to their mother, pays her little attentions, treats her as if she were something very precious, defers to her opinion and is constantly her lover, the boys, and the girls, too, will catch the father's tone and grow up in the practice of gentle manners, after his gracious example.

A father should be to his children a type of their Father who is in heaven. What do we think of when we say, "Our Father"? Is there not in the mind an image of One whose care and tenderness never fail, whose wisdom is infinite, whose goodness is unceasing, whose power is without limit and whose commandments must be obeyed? All that we attribute to our Father above, the child in the earliest years attributes to the earthly father. The gentleness and goodness of our God are shown to our human hearts in the very fact that he lets us call him by this sweet name.

A NAVAJO WEDDING

W. R. JOHNSTON, a missionary to the Navajo Indians, stationed at Tolchaco, Ariz., writes encouragingly to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the progress of the Gospel among that tribe. He says:

Thirty Navajos have applied for baptism. God's truth is working its way. Recently one of our missionaries visited an Indian camp, thirty miles down the river. He said to the old man of the camp: "Your grandson, who is at our mission school, does not pray to Pe-go-chidy any more; he now knows Jesus, and prays to him." The old man expressed his satisfaction, and then, calling all his family into the hogan, he said, "Pray for us before you go." This man has seemed for several years on the verge of turning away from heathenism to Jesus Christ.

Recently an Indian of seventy-six years was brought to us, very sick. When he began to improve, he said, "I would have died had you not taken me in." When convalescent, we told him the old Gospel, new and strange to him; after meditating a while, he said, "I am so old, how can I find the way?"

Chat-Chos-Nez-Bi-Gay
The Bridegroom

Hustine Yazhi-Bit-si
The Bride

Recently the missionary went to a Navajo wedding. It was at Tog-l-chee-bi-gay's (Red Whiskers Son). He bought a Navajo sleeping blanket, made in New England; also a sack of flour as a present for the bride.

There were many guests at the wedding, only two of them being women, however. At the large family hogan (house) a big meal was served. The place looked attractive, with the fire in the centre and all around the outer edge the sheepskins laid in regular order, with sacks of wool at the head of each upon which to rest the head and shoulders, Navajo style. The writer proceeds:

The women are baking tatneel-ghazh (bread fried in mutton tallow). As I take my place on one of the skins, the bride's father is telling Big-Strong-Back about a comfort he wanted to buy for his daughter, and the listener says, "How much have you?" "One dollar," the father replies, and then Big-Strong-Back takes that dollar and puts it with two of his own, mounts his horse and rides away in the gray of the evening to the trading post, six miles away, returning after a while with the article.

Every one eats all he desires of the bread and mutton; there is plenty of coffee, too, and sugar to sweeten it. Conversation flows on. Some stroll out under the stars. I ask where the bridegroom and his relatives are, and Mr. Little-Navajo points to a hogan about one hundred yards away. In answer to my question, he tells me that it will be entirely proper for me to go there, so I walk over. "Man Who Talks Too Much" is outside. He is a very good friend of mine, and I ask him where the bridegroom is. He points out into the night. My friend, who is a relative and has had a good deal to do with arranging matters, tells me how much was paid for the girl—eight horses, a string of silver beads and $16.50 in money. None of this goes to the bride, but all to her mother, who distributes the horses to her relatives and keeps the money and necklace.

I join the bridegroom, Chat-chos-nez-bi-gay, and chat with him and his relatives. Others come in and the hogan is full, except a little space around the fire in the centre. Then the missionary seizes his opportunity and, with the best Navajo he can command, he tells them how that God, who sits behind the sky, made all things in the beginning—the sky, the earth, the sea, the creatures and man—putting in plenty of detail, for the Indian likes to have all the details; the story of the beautiful garden and the forbidden tree is gone over, the fall with its direful results to our first parents and the creation and the race; God's love, God's remedy, God's hatred of and commands against praying to sun and moon, earth and mountains, bears and snakes. The blind man says, "Those are good words;" all seem impressed.

About midnight the master of ceremonies comes in, bearing a wedding basket half full of corn-meal mush, which the bride has ground and cooked. The bride comes in next and takes her place beside the groom, the wedding basket is set down before the two young people. Others come in, bringing meat and Indian bread, a large dish of roast meat is set down beside the mush. Now the master of ceremonies hands a cup of water to the young woman, who proceeds to pour it upon the hands of the bridegroom, that he may wash them. When he has finished, he performs a like office for her. Mr. Little-Navajo then takes from his pocket a small buckskin bag containing corn pollen, one of the most sacred things the Navajo knows. He sprinkles a line of it across the mush, then another line transversely. Now, the bridegroom is told to take some of the mush with his fingers from the east side of the basket, at the end of the line of corn pollen, the bride is instructed to do the same, then from the west, north, south and centre in the same way. Then the bridegroom helps himself to the meat, the mush is passed to the nearest relatives, and when they have partaken the company help themselves. One after another comes forward and partakes liberally, the index finger is thrust down into the gravy in the meat dish and transferred to the mouth, with enough noise to show one's appreciation. Now the relatives, according to age and rank, express their thanks and congratulations to one another and give advice to the young people in a series of speeches lasting for two or three hours. It is nearly daylight before the celebration is over.

For the Invalid Chair

IN response to a paragraph in THE MAIL-BAG lately, several readers have sent in contributions to be applied toward the purchase of an invalid chair for a poor, aged Christian woman, who is greatly in need of one. The contributors are:

Aged Christian, Plainfield, N. J., $1; P. N. K., Rheems, Pa., $1; J. A. S., Malvern, Kan., $1; J. D., Sr., Sterling, Ill., $1; Reader, Tidioute, Pa., $1; B. C., Boston, $1; Reader, Salem, N. J., $2; Mrs. J. D. S., Americus, Kan., 25 cents.

It is hoped that a comfortable wheel-chair, suited to the needs of the aged invalid (who has been unable to walk for many years), may soon be provided. Any other contributions for this benevolent purpose will be acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Perseverance in Gospel Labors*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

LET us glance at the two Antiochs on this map: Antioch in Syria on the right, and Antioch in Pisidia on the left. These two cities were founded in about the same period—300 B.C.—and probably by the same man, Seleucus Nicanor. Antioch in Syria was one of the three greatest cities in the Roman world, the other two being Rome and Alexandria. But what is most interesting to the Christian is that it was the "mother city of Gentile Christianity." The other Antioch was of lesser importance, almost destitute of culture, and yet was the chief city of one of the provinces of Asia Minor. Pisidia afterwards was incorporated in Galatia, belonging to the region of Pamphilia.

These two Antiochs were all of four hundred miles distant from each other, and between them lay the Taurus Mountains.

As a preacher of the Gospel Paul was welcomed to Antioch in Syria, and half the people in the city became Christians: one hundred thousand through his teaching and that of Barnabas. Not so at Antioch in Pisidia; a persecution was stirred up there, and Paul and Barnabas were cast out of the city, but not until they had passed two Sabbaths there and preached concerning Christ to multitudes of people thronging the synagogue. Paul made subsequent visits there, and succeeded in establishing a Christian church, one of the churches to which the Epistle to the Galatians was sent.

Antioch in Syria, although destroyed by earthquakes ten times in the first six centuries, is still a city of some importance, having a population of six thousand inhabitants.

Antioch in Pisidia is in ruins.

Map of Paul's First Missionary Journey, showing the two Antiochs

A Brief Explanation

Verse 13. "Now Paul and his company," the company being Barnabas and John Mark, a young man, a cousin of Barnabas, started together from Antioch in Syria, but only Paul and Barnabas reached Antioch in Pisidia, John Mark having returned to Jerusalem after reaching Perga, within one hundred miles of Antioch in Pisidia, for some reason not stated, but much queried about. His sudden return might have been caused by sickness, as it was an unhealthy region, or there might have been dissension.

Verse 14. "They went into the synagogue" on the Sabbath day—the Jewish Sabbath—the seventh day of the week, not the first.

Verse 14. "And sat down." Great teachers though they were, they humbly took their places among the listeners.

Verse 15. "After the reading of the law and the prophets"—not the whole, but selections, regularly a part of the worship in all synagogues.

Verse 15. "If ye have any word of exhortation for the people, say on." This word was sent to Paul and Barnabas by the rulers of the synagogue, who, sitting in their high seats, had discovered they had visitors of note.

Verse 16. "Paul stood up, beckoning with his hand." This was unusual, because a Jewish teacher was accustomed to sit while talking. But Paul preferred to remain in the midst of the people rather than to go to the front, and was obliged to stand in order to be seen and heard. The gesture made by him was to invite attention.

Verses 16-41. The theme: Jesus, the promised Messiah.

1. The history of God's dealings with the Jews as his chosen people.

2. The promise of a Messiah, as a descendant of King David.

3. John the Baptist proclaimed the forerunner of the Messiah.

4. Jesus Christ declared the promised Messiah.

5. How he was rejected by the Jews, and crucified.

6. How he was raised from the dead, and became the Saviour of the world, that whosoever believeth on him shall not perish, but have eternal life.

7. Condemnation of those who reject Jesus as the Messiah and Saviour.

After the sermon was preached there were many people who were sympathizers with the truth as preached by Paul that day in Antioch, and they thronged about Paul and Barnabas at the close of the services, just as we gather about a speaker after we have listened to a sermon or an address which has much interested us. Many who spoke to Paul and Barnabas were Jews, and others were people of every race and nation. A new day had indeed dawned for them. All had the same request to make: that they would preach again on the next Sabbath. Paul and Barnabas kindly replied to all, and urged them to continue in the grace of God.

The Second Sabbath in Antioch

Almost the whole city came out to hear the Word of God, Paul being again the preacher. The audience was probably too large to be accommodated in the synagogue, and so the services were likely held out of doors. There were two kinds of listeners: first, those who heard gladly that the Gentiles were to be given a chance, and second, the irate Jews, who were not willing that the Gentiles should have lot and part in the grace of God. So bitterly did the unbelieving Jews oppose such teaching that they worked up a mob by which Paul and Barnabas were cast out of the city. Did Paul and Barnabas, therefore, cease their Gospel work? No; they went directly on to the near-by city of Iconium and opened up another Gospel mission.

FOOD FACTS

What an M. D. Learned

A prominent Georgia physician went through a food experience which he makes public:

"It was my own experience that first led me to advocate Grape-Nuts food and I also know, from having prescribed it to convalescents and other weak patients, that the food is a wonderful rebuilder and restorer of nerve and brain tissue, as well as muscle. It improves the digestion and sick patients always gain just as I did in strength and weight very rapidly.

"I was in such a low state that I had to give up my work entirely, and went to the mountains of this state, but two months there did not improve me; in fact, I was not quite as well as when I left home.

"My food did not sustain me and it became plain that I must change. Then I began to use Grape-Nuts food and in two weeks I could walk a mile without fatigue, and in five weeks returned to my home and practice, taking up hard work again. Since that time I have felt as well and strong as I ever did in my life.

"As a physician who seeks to help all sufferers, I consider it a duty to make these facts public."

Trial 10 days on Grape-Nuts, when the regular food does not seem to sustain the body, will work miracles.

"There's a Reason."

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Were Paul and Barnabas so discouraged that they never returned again to Antioch? Were they afraid to go back? They did return; they knew neither fear nor discouragement; and there they found a great company of believers, "as many as were ordained to eternal life"—ordained in the sense that they had welcomed the offer of eternal life by their own choice. "Whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely."

Paul and Barnabas were not "cold-feet," neither were the believers that had remained in Antioch. Let the Bishop of Selkirk give the meaning of "coldfeet": "Perhaps you have heard of a tribe of American Indians called 'Blackfeet.' But the coldfeet are white men. When the rush to the Klondike for gold took place, thousands traveled day and night over frost and snow, until many, worn out with fatigue and hardship, turned back and lost their chance of fortune, or fell by the wayside helpless from the cold feet, which they had no means of warming. Now 'coldfeet' is the name given by the miners of the Klondike to those who fail in any enterprise from want of grit. And the Klondike miners are a splendid illustration of the survival of the fittest, for they are literally those who survived all the hardships of the journey, so proving themselves to possess truly remarkable powers of endurance, both physical and mental." And now, we repeat, Paul and Barnabas were no coldfeet. They knew how to endure hardness as necessary for good soldiers of Christ. They knew that their Leader could not fail to lead them to victory.

Men show grit in temporal matters. Why should they not also do it in spiritual things? Cyrus Field toiled anxiously and ceaselessly for thirteen years trying to perfect the Atlantic cable, and earnestly prayed that he might live until it was accomplished. He saw at last his heart's desire.

When brick-making was commenced at Tuskegee, the first twenty-five hundred bricks were spoiled in the kiln. The second lot of bricks were a failure, and the third also. Without a dollar left, a discouraged set of teachers and scholars advised against any more attempts at brick-making, but Booker Washington pawned his watch for money to make a fourth trial, which brought success and has resulted in the erection of a large number of useful and beautiful buildings at Tuskegee and elsewhere.

The grit that was in evidence as Paul and Barnabas continued their work "in perils of rivers, in perils of robbers, in perils in the wilderness, in perils among false brethren," has been shown by missionaries of the Lord Jesus who have followed in their footsteps. Dr. Judson labored in Burma seven years before he had a convert. Dr. Morrison labored in China ten years before he had a convert. Gordon Hall preached the Gospel in Bombay for fifteen years, and died without seeing a convert. It would be possible to make a long list of missionary workers who were filled with sanctified grit.

The apostle Peter said: "Add to your faith virtue." The word virtue has the same root as the Latin word for a manly man, and also the word for a strong rod. The passage might be paraphrased in modern language thus: "Add to your faith, backbone, firmness, tenacity. Add to your faith, faithfulness.

With definiteness we need decision, with tenderness, tenacity. These latter qualities gave Wellington Waterloo. One order of that day represented all of his orders: "Hold this spot to the last man." At Waterloo tenacity defeated intensity. General Grant succeeded by the same tenacity. "He never knew when he was beaten," said the enemy.

A saint must persevere in Christian work or cease to be a saint. We have only a lifetime to work, but there is an eternity for results. We have only a few years for sowing, but the harvest of that seed will last throughout eternity. Let us remember that God does not say, "Well done, successful servant," but "Well done, good and faithful servant."

We would not forget that some people are more easily vanquished by small things than by great ones. To all such we commend the strengthening lines of Phillips Brooks:

The little sharp vexations,
And the briars that catch and fret,
Why not take all to the Helper
Who has never failed us yet?
Tell him about the heartache,
And tell him the longings, too;
Tell him the baffled purpose
When we scarce know what to do;
Then, leaving all our weakness
With the One divinely strong,
Forget that we bore the burden,
And carry away the song.

The Word Sown

"The word of the Lord was spread abroad throughout all the region." And if we would know about the harvest that quickly followed, we must read Paul's Epistles to the Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians and Thessalonians. We must study the history of the seven churches, and the messages sent to them from the Lord Jesus himself after he had ascended to his Father (Revelations, chapters 1, 2 and 3). We must study the work of the Church since then and in these present times. We must consider the work of the Sunday School through the International Lesson System, which has done so much in spreading the Word abroad among all the nations of the world.

The more than four hundred languages in which the Bible is now printed have engaged sowers in almost every land in the world. Viewed in that light, the Bible cannot be called an out-of-date book.

A Christian chief in the New Hebrides Islands, who, before his conversion, had been a cannibal, was reading his Bible when a French trader came up to him and exclaimed:

"What is that you are reading?"

"The Bible."

"Oh, that's played out. Don't believe in the Bible. Nobody does nowadays, on our side."

"Don't you?" queried the chief.

"No."

"Then let me tell you, sir, if it was not for the Bible, you would be in my oven."

A traveler in England once found himself in a large wood. He listened to the singing of birds and admired the gorgeous foliage and lovely wild flowers. When daylight began to fade, he decided to hasten out of the wood, but was dismayed to find that he had lost his way. He turned to the right, to the left, before and behind—there was nothing but trees. He feared he would be obliged to spend the night in the wood, and be in danger of wild boars and other fierce animals. Hark! What was that? The sound of bells in the distance. He almost shouted for joy. He walked eagerly and swiftly toward the place from whence the sound came, and in a short time he was out of the wood and standing in front of the Church of St. Peter, Mancroft, Norwich. So thankful was he for his deliverance, that thinking that other folks might lose their way in the wood, before he passed on his journey he left a sum of money sufficient to pay for the ringing of the church bells twice a day. In the Bible are the bells of God to warn and guide and cheer those who are out of the way. And those who have found their way out of the wilderness of sin through the ringing of the Gospel bells should help others to do so, too.

THE STORY OF MARCO

"Who called me 'Bonesy'?" he demanded.

In the startled hush that answered, the woman jerked him about with a relentless hand.

"See here, boy, what's the meaning of this? Why did you come back? Where are your folks?"

"I didn't come back. I was left."

"Left!"

"Yes, with mumsey." A sudden remembrance seemed to come to the boy, and with a complete change of manner, he once more held out his hat. "She's sick. It's for her I'm playin'. Hain't you got just—a penny?" he begged tremulously.

"No, I hain't," snapped the woman; "and if I had I shouldn't give it ter the likes o' you. Be gone with ye!" And the Widow Martin retreated into the house and banged the door behind her.

The Widow Martin was angry. Born upon a New Hampshire farm, and thrust by an unkind fate into a Pennsylvania mining town, she had all the New England woman's hatred of dirt, disorder and "shiftlessness." Ten years among the Slavs, Polanders, Swedes, Italians and Portuguese about her, moreover, had only added to her original hatred of "foreigners." That a "dirty little gipsy tramp" should presume to ask her aid, was intolerable; and still more so was the thought that she had so far forgotten herself as to stand and listen to his playing. But even as she frowned with anger, an echo of the witchery of that music swept over her, and involuntarily she crept to the window to see what had become of the player.

The boy was confronting the crowd, holding the violin half behind his back. His face was white, and curiously set, but he received in silence the catcalls and yells of "Bonesy" from the jeering men and boys.

With an angry exclamation the Widow Martin ran to her door and jerked it open. It had been her intention to disperse the crowd with no gentle command; but she had scarcely appeared on the doorstep when she found herself, to her dumbfounded amazement, holding a violin in her hands, while the boy—its recent guardian—was making so vigorous a use of his strong little fists that the jeers were rapidly giving place to howls of pain and rage. For a dazed minute the Widow Martin watched in silence the extraordinary sight of one small boy trying to put to rout a score of antagonists; then she dashed into the crowd, caught young Marco Ferdinando Bonelli by the collar of his blouse, and dragged him into the house. Once there, she shut the door, dropped the boy into a chair, and the violin on to the table.

"Well, young man, this is a pretty how-d'ye-do," she said sternly.

The boy did not answer. He did not, indeed, seem to hear her. He struggled to his feet and hurried to the table, examining with anxious eyes and tender fingers the violin. Then with a relieved sigh he turned a beaming face on the woman.

"Thank ye, ma'am—an' it didn't even get scratched!" he exulted. "You was good ter come and hold it for me. I was wonderin' what ter do with it when you hove in sight. But I guess we fixed 'em all right; didn't we?"

"We! We!" gasped the Widow Martin, almost dumb at this calm inclusion of herself in the recent fray; but the boy went on unconcernedly.

"And now, if you don't mind, I'll go. As long as you hain't got anythin' for mumsey, why I must be findin' somebody what has, you know," he smiled cheerfully, tucking the violin under his arm.

"But what—how—" The Widow Martin stumbled over her words, and came to a dazed pause. She had brought this boy into the house to give him a sound lecture. She found herself now in the uncomfortable position of one who has somehow been weighed and found wanting. "See here, boy, where is your mother?" she finished sharply.

"In the tent where they left her."

"Yes'um, ma'am." The boy hesitated, then drew himself to his full height. "I didn't leave her!"

Something came into the Widow Martin's throat—a most extraordinary something that made her choke and catch her breath. She rose hurriedly and went into the next room. When she came back she thrust a dingy ten-cent piece into the boy's hand.

"Here, now go—quick!" she commanded crossly, to hide that same something in her throat, which was still there, and which forbade her voice to be steady. "Go—and don't ye come back. I don't like boys, nor tramps, nor gipsies!" she flung out as she opened wide the door.

"Thank ye, ma'am," joyfully beamed the boy, who seemed to be conscious of nothing but the bit of money in his hand. "Good-by!" And he marched blithely through the open doorway.

It was not long before all of Gaylordville knew of the boy and the sick woman whom the gipsies had left in the clearing; and all of Gaylordville was disturbed. The woman was undeniably very ill, though she insisted herself that she was getting better fast, and would soon be able to follow her friends, who, she said, were waiting for her a few miles farther on. Just what to do with her, the town authorities did not know. So far as air and isolation were concerned, she was best off where she was, and there really seemed to be no other place for her. The doctors declared, too, that the outdoor treatment was just what she needed, though at the same time they shook their heads gravely and prophesied that she would not long need anything. So the local officials contented themselves by seeing that a nurse was sent to look after her wants, and that curious idlers were kept away from her tent. Beyond that they gave themselves little concern.

It came to be a very common thing to see the boy about the Gaylordville streets during the days that followed; and everywhere with him was the violin. The hoots and jeers were fewer now—possibly the impression made by his small brown fists had not been forgotten.

In Marco's own estimation, he was taking care of his mother; and never was he so pleased as when a bun or a bit of fruit he had bought for her would bring a smile to her eyes. He still sat with her in the twilight and talked of the beautiful days to come; and his violin still softly whispered of the fine new house, with its obsequious servants among whom she would walk in the silken gown of blue. The little mother, however, no longer sat at the door of the tent, but lay back on her cot, white-faced—except for the treacherous roses—and panting for breath after the cruel cough. She said that she was only tired, and would soon be well.

A Glowing Testimonial

Dear Christian Herald: I have received the premium book, After Death—What? which I read with delight. I found great comfort in the preface, and I think the two chapters, "Our Children in Heaven" and "Shall We Know Each Other There?" and the "Poems of Comfort" are alone worth the price paid for both THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and this great book.

Very truly yours,

Abestine, Va. E. COLLINS.

Come Into the Light

There are some few foods which must be factory cooked, because every home lacks the facilities. Crackers and beans are among them.

Home-baked beans ferment and form gas, because they don't digest. Most of them fail to get half enough heat.

They are mushy and broken, while all people like beans nutty, mealy and whole. It isn't your fault, its your lack of facilities.

We employ steam ovens, so we apply 245 degrees heat without bursting or crisping a bean.

We bake in small parcels so the full heat goes through. Thus Van Camp's don't ferment and form gas.

We bake the tomato sauce into the beans and get our delicious blend.

Beans are 84% nutriment. They contain more food than the choicest beef, yet they cost not a third as much.

They are appetizing, hearty and economical. And our beans are ready to serve.

Don't you think it worth while to serve a can of Van Camp's and learn what they mean to you?

Van Camp's BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE PORK AND BEANS

Don't judge Van Camp's by other baked beans. We pay $2.25 per bushel to get the whitest and plumpest of Michigan beans. Some beans sell for 30 cents.

We use whole, vine-ripened tomatoes to make a sauce that costs five times as much as some others.

Don't expect cheap beans, poor sauce and wrong methods to make such a dish as we make. Insist on the genuine.

Three sizes: 10, 15 and 20 cents per can.

The Interpreter's House*

THE lessons imparted by the Interpreter to Christian are doubtless all that are necessary for the young convert. He must lift up his eyes constantly to heaven; the Bible must be in his hand; and the law of truth must be written on his lips.

In addition to all this, the world present must be ever of less account to him than the world to come, where a crown of glory awaits the faithful. His deeds must be done with the thought before him of their bearing upon that life. Of each daily crisis, as it comes to him, he must ask, "Is this calculated to make me fitter to dwell with beings of perfect purity forever, or is it not?"

For there is nothing which so emphasizes and renders offensive grime and blemishes as to contrast them with stainless whiteness.

The quaint figure of the ill-swept room not only imparts a practical lesson in housewifery (and especially in street-cleaning), but throws a certain light upon Paul's strong figures, illustrating the work of the law and the work of faith. The unexpected introduction of these little teachings, by the way, gives to this wonderful allegory one of its greatest charms.

There is no stronger story in the book than that of Passion and Patience. Old and young will profit by keeping it constantly in mind.

Figure follows hard on figure here, reminding us that Bunyan lived in an age when animals, feelings, plants, everything, were personified. Neither prose nor poetry which did not employ this artifice was then considered truly refined. Milton and Dryden were the two most conspicuous literary figures of the time, and Collins followed soon after. Possibly it was largely because of the purely natural character of his work that Shakespeare failed of contemporary distinction. The literature of nature could no better be appreciated in those days than could the great artist David appreciate the so-called "natural" school of painting in France. The age was steeped in mysticism, and everybody who aspired to the good opinion of the arbiters of literary fame wrote in tropes.

Poor Bunyan probably had little thought of literary greatness when he constructed, thought by thought and trope by trope, his Pilgrim story in that damp prison-chamber overlooking the Ouse. He lived to see it sold by the hundred thousand; but it was not considered as literature by the great lordly writers of his time, who scorned the poor tinker and his simple works, little dreaming that long after their pompous compositions had been relegated to the limbo of mere "studentlore," the Pilgrim's Progress would be still on the tongues of the people of every land.

We wander breathlessly on with the rapt Pilgrim, watching the quenchless fire, fed secretly with oil (the fire of grace in our own hearts, which the world, the flesh and the devil endeavor daily to put out); then to the door of the stately palace, where the man "of a very stout countenance" cuts his way through the opposing rabble, and joins the white-robed throng within; and then on to the sad, backslidden one in the iron cage; and to him who saw the day of judgment dawning ere he was prepared.

As one of our modern poets has well said, this stay in the Interpreter's house gave to Pilgrim the preparation for the hard journey before him, to > Shape his acts, and discipline his mind,

> To walk adorning earth with hope of heaven.

Making a Guest of Christ*

OURS is not what may be called an age of faith. It is a time when men question everything. The universal cry is, "You say thus and so, but can you prove it?" Perhaps it was never so hard as now to put one's hand in Christ's, give up one's own way, and say, "Lead me whithersoever thou wilt. I trust Thy word."

Yet it is only through loving faith in Him that the door of our hearts can be opened for his entrance. This is beautifully portrayed in Miss Kimball's striking poem, beginning "Speechless sorrow sat with me."

The lamp was out—the rain "wildly beat the window pane." Some one knocked; the door was unlocked. Then

> Opening wide the door He came,
> But I could not speak his name.
> In the guest chair took his place.
> But I could not see his face.
> When my little lamp was beaming,
> When my little fire was gleaming,
> And the board was spread for three, [me.
> Lo, my Master was the guest that supped with

Thus, as we all know, but as we need constantly to remind ourselves, Christ stands ever outside our hearts, knocking to come in. Especially in our seasons of affliction does he press upon us the comfort of his presence.

And yet, through heedlessness, or ignorance, or obstinacy, we too often "leave him standing there."

"We must put ourselves," says President King, "steadily, persistently into the closest possible relation with Christ. Only so shall we be following the prime law for coming into all the greatest values of life—staying persistently in the presence of the best we know in the realm of the spiritual, with honest response to its natural, inevitable appeal. This will bring us surely into Christ's life of love."

In Drummond's wonderful essay on "Growth," he shows how the mysterious increase in spirituality which every true Christian should experience can come only from the indwelling of Christ in the soul. "No man by taking thought has ever added a cubit to his stature; nor has any man by mere working at his soul ever approached nearer to the stature of the Lord Jesus. The Christ-life unfolds from a divine germ, planted centrally in the nature, which grows as naturally as a flower."

This germ is the spirit of Christ himself, ever hovering without each human soul, pleading to be let in, and, once admitted, purifying, uplifting, healing, comforting; and yet so dull are men that too often they close their hearts against the heavenly Guest, brutally barring it out, and even sometimes flinging it a ribald defiance.

George Matheson, in one of his eloquent apostrophes, thanks God for the blessings which he sometimes gives to us in spite of our indifference or even sin. "There are those," he says, "who, like Jacob, get a blessing from thee before they have learned thy name. They do not know the cause of their own heart's burning. They say, 'I got it from the torch of Nature. I was walking on the road to Emmaus, and a man met me and gave me light.' Thou art that man, O Lord. My heart has been heated by thee. My grace is thy gift. My warmth is the working of thy wings. Even when my doors are shut, I may be reached by thee. Thy peace can tread where there is no pathway. Send me, Lord, thy joy and rest. Fan into flame my emberless fireplace. Send me steadfastness in the storm, and bravery in the loss of battle."

All this comes to the soul which has Christ for its constant guest—your soul, my soul, any soul, to-day and forever.

Let us send you this stunning Petticoat without a penny from you

Find out, at our risk and expense, what a surprising value this is!

Judge, after you see the Petticoat; after you try it on, whether you can afford to miss this remarkable bargain. We send the Petticoat prepaid; no C.O.D., no obligation whatever. You don't pay a penny in advance, you don't risk a single cent. This is the new way—the way to make sure of getting exactly the Petticoat you want. Just a letter from you will bring you this strikingly stylish Petticoat. Made-to-your-measure—made of the beautiful new fabric—Taffeta Loraine.

See, before your glass, how smoothly and trimly this Petticoat fits, how smartly it drapes. Note how gracefully your outerskirt hangs, over this Petticoat.

Then judge of the beauty of this new fabric, Taffeta Loraine—the fabric which delights every one who sees it. Note that it has the richness and "rustle" of silk. But mark this: you will find it far firmer and stronger than silk, far more durable. It won't crack, split, nor "fall to pieces."

So you get, at about one-third the cost, the smartness of silk, plus far more service and wear. For the price of this remarkable Petticoat, if you decide to keep it, is only $2.00.

Send back the Petticoat, or send $2.00, whichever you prefer, within two days of receipt.

Judge of the astonishing saving. We are manufacturers, selling direct. We save you wholesaler's and retailer's profits. That is how we give you such wonderful value. You could not have as good a Petticoat made for less than $3.50 or $4.00.

This stunning Taffeta Loraine Petticoat, made to measure, only $2

But you are to decide, after you see the Petticoat, whether all we say is true. If it doesn't in every way suit you, return it and it won't cost you a cent. If you decide that you want it, simply send us $2.00.

Note the Patent Self-Fitting Adjustment

This garment is cut in the latest style—on the lines of the new dress skirts. Daintily but strongly made. Patent Fasteners give 12 adjustments around the waist and hips—no draw-strings, no puckering, no bunchiness. 6 gores, with a rich 16-inch 4-ruffle flounce; a 9-inch under-flounce with a 3-inch dust ruffle. Ruffles elaborately shirred. Seams bound in and reinforced by tape.

The colors are Black, Navy, Tan Golden Brown, Taupe Gray, Maroon, Bottle Green and Nile Green. For an out-size Petticoat—over 30-inch waist, 50-inch hip or 44-inch length—50c extra.

Don't send any money—Simply give us your waist, hip, and front-and-back length measures, and state color you want. While you are about it, why not place an order in this way for each of the women-folk in your family who may need a petticoat? This is the safe way—far better than buying at your local store; for there you have little chance to judge before paying your money. We give you two full days after you get your petticoat, to make up your mind how you like it.

You see you are SURE OF SATISFACTION before sending any money; so sit down and write us now, before you forget it.

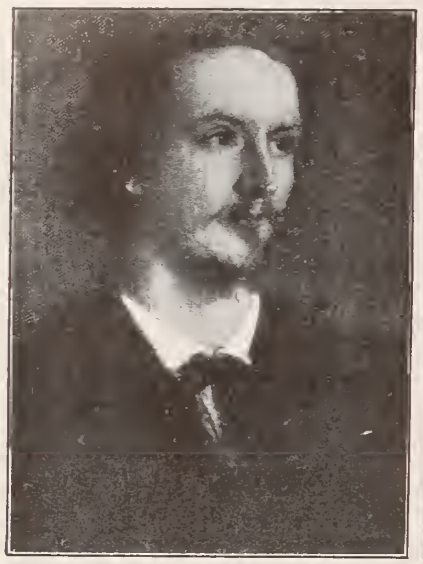
The Passing of Two Great Writers

WITHIN twenty-four hours of each other two of the greatest writers of a generation in the English tongue—one a novelist, the other a poet—passed into the world beyond. The novelist was Francis Marion Crawford, the American writer, who died at his villa at Sorrento, Italy; the poet was Algernon Charles Swinburne, the last of the great Victorian poets of England.

In Crawford the present generation had one of its most prolific, as well as interesting, writers of finished English. Despite the large number of books which came from his pen, he always maintained a certain high standard of style and composition.



Algernon Charles Swinburne

Francis Marion Crawford

His career as a writer is as interesting a romance as any he ever wrote. He was born at the Baths of Lucca, in north Italy, August 2, 1854. His father was Thomas Crawford, a man of Scotch blood, though born in Ireland. Thomas came to America in boyhood and soon demonstrated his budding genius as a sculptor. He married Miss Louisa Ward, a sister of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe. The Crawfords moved to Italy, where Thomas could better carry on his work.

Crawford did not show any particular aptitude for writing in his student days. In fact, it is said that he felt he was without imagination.

It was almost by chance that he wrote his first story. One day in New York, in 1882, he was telling his uncle about a diamond merchant, Mr. Jacobs, in India. The uncle, "Sam" Ward, was struck with the idea that Jacobs' career would make a good story. He persuaded Crawford to write. Unwillingly the young man, who thought he was without creative powers, set to work. In thirty-two days the book, under the title of Mr. Isaacs, was finished. It was an instantaneous success, and it settled the fact that Crawford's life-work was to be literature. He began to write on Italian themes, and made the field his own.

Mr. Crawford died as a result of an attack of influenza. Once he said, speaking of the approach of Good Friday, "I die with Christ," and as he passed away he murmured, "I enter serenely into eternity."

Algernon Charles Swinburne was both a poet and essayist and one of that distinguished coterie of men of letters who made memorable the Victorian age in literature. He was born in London in 1837. He was precocious in his youthful love of letters and began to write early, and it is related he used to take a copy of Shakespeare to bed with him. He was educated at Eton and Oxford. At Eton the headmaster remonstrated with him on the time he spent on the poets and ended by making him free of his own library. Soon after leaving, he wrote several poems which made his fame and in later years his verse was measured by the high standard set in his youth. In his earlier verses he shows distinctly radical tendencies. This spirit of poetical revolution became gradually modified and was replaced by a spirit of patriotism and a longing to sing his country's glories. His verse was marked by originality; one poem did not ring reminiscently of the others which had preceded it; by sincerity and earnestness, he showed at all times his master ability as a word painter.

are not telling what they know. They are the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and Chief Wilkie. With Chief Wilkie I had a talk, and he told me as much perhaps as he tells anybody. The Secret Service was started for two purposes: to suppress counterfeiting, and to protect the President. As the other departments had no such service it gradually became their custom to borrow the Treasury Secret Service men as need arose. This apparently harmless practice was stopped by action of the last Congress. The Secret Service men are now confined to their original duties: suppressing counterfeiting and protecting the President.

Many other interesting branches of the Treasury Department, such as the Marine Hospital Service and the Life-Saving Service, space does not permit me even to touch upon. The head of almost every division with whom I talked told me that a book could be written about the work of his division alone. I have every reason to believe it. One of the most inspiring things about the Treasury Department is the pride and interest both officials and employees take in their work. There are a number of officials of great administrative ability who are working cheerfully on clerks' salaries. Some of them have refused tempting offers to go into private employment. They are the kind of patriots who are essential to the success of our republic.

PAUL AT ANTIOCH

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE work of the two evangelists in Cyprus was done; Sergius Paulus was left behind to care for the disciples who had been made there. Their next move was to Perga in Pamphylia, a province of Asia Minor, and here John (or Mark) the evangelist (in the house of whose mother prayer was made for Peter on the night of his liberation), "departing from them, returned to Jerusalem." This young man had not counted the cost of a missionary's life; he was not yet entire for God. Their next station was Antioch in Pisidia (quite another than that Antioch in Syria, where the disciples were first called Christians). Guided, doubtless, by God, they "went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day, and sat down." Perhaps rumors of them had preceded their visit; in any case, "the rulers of the synagogue sent unto them, saying, 'Ye men and brethren, if ye have any word of exhortation for the people, say on."

Paul was the spokesman, and he took the Jewish audience back to their early history, and the way by which God had led them as a nation. He drew the eye of those Asiatic Jews to God's dealings in faithfulness and love with his chosen people. He was preaching to a Bible-knowing and Bible-loving people, and it was necessary that he should prove his testimony to Jesus from the Scriptures themselves.

Paul went on boldly, stating the facts which had happened. "For they that dwelt at Jerusalem, and their rulers, because they knew Him not, nor yet the voice of the prophets which are read every Sabbath day, they have fulfilled them in condemning him." "They knew not the Scriptures, neither the power of God." Paul most carefully noted that all which happened to Jesus had been foretold. Probably he pointed out the very Scriptures which spoke of his sufferings and death. Then he spoke of the resurrection. The resurrection of Christ was always the touchstone both with Jew and Gentile. If it could be proved that this Jesus of Nazareth had risen unaided from the dead, he must be God and they could no longer consistently disbelieve in him. This Paul knew, and, after having asserted that there were witnesses to the fact, he applied to his audience, proving still from Scripture all he had asserted. And now this strange teacher established a connection between his hearers and Jesus. Paul gave two Scripture proofs of Christ's resurrection: "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee" (Ps. 2:7), and "Thou shalt not suffer thine Holy One to see corruption" (Ps. 16:10); and he thus argued, "For David, after he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell on sleep, and was laid unto his fathers, and saw corruption; but he whom God raised again saw no corruption." Here was proof positive that the Holy One referred to was Christ, proof positive also that that Holy One, being dead, was not subject, as other human beings are, to the ordinary law of corruption and decay; that his death was the fulfilment of the Scripture.

OUR SHORTHAND CLASSES

REMARKABLE success has attended the Correspondence Course of Standard Shorthand during the past year, over 1,000 CHRISTIAN HERALD pupils having been successfully taught in a little over eight months. At the request of many other readers, who have written expressing a desire to take up the study of Pitman-Graham (the recognized "standard" system, which is taught in these classes), it has been decided to give the course under the "individual instruction" method, which assures still more rapid and satisfactory progress. We are now teaching large numbers under this method by mail, each individual pupil standing in a class by himself.

The Correspondence Course consists of twenty-four lessons, very simple and easily understood. Under the "individual method" each lesson is examined, corrected and returned promptly to the student. Prepared stationery is sent with each lesson. The student has the advantage of every lesson being an examination, and thus makes rapid progress.

This special Correspondence Course is open to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers and their friends at the nominal enrolment fee of $2, being rather less than one-tenth the cost charged in the average business college. There are no extra charges whatsoever. The following are taken from hundreds of testimonials received:

"I am well satisfied with the Course. It is easy to learn. I will certainly recommend it to others."—Alvenia Schultz, East Greenville, Pa.

"You make each lesson perfectly clear, and I think no one could fail to learn if they follow your instructions. I will recommend your Course wherever I have the opportunity."—Mrs. M. Dingee, Brooklyn, N. Y.

"I am very well pleased with the Correspondence Course. The instructions were so plain one could not possibly misunderstand them."—Linnie Topping, Ashley, Ill.

"The Course has been very satisfactory to me, and I made good use of it."—Arthur T. Lukens, Plymouth Meeting, Pa.

"I am much pleased with the Course. It is an excellent way to learn shorthand at one-tenth the expense it would cost in a business college."—Robert W. Langley, Everett, Wash.

"The lessons are short and concise, yet clear and progressive; and I was particularly pleased with the spirit of optimism and encouragement with which you strove to imbue the student from the very beginning."—George E. Gamble, Philadelphia, Pa.

By taking advantage of this opportunity now, any student will be able to complete the course by midsummer and be ready for a business opening before the fall. All applications for enrolment should be sent, with full name and address, accompanied by enrolment fee of $2, to "Correspondence Course of Shorthand," THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York.

LEARNING THINGS

We are all in the Apprentice Class.

When a simple change of diet brings back health and happiness the story is briefly told. A lady of Springfield, Ill., says:

"After being afflicted for years with nervousness and heart trouble, I received a shock four years ago that left me in such a condition that my life was despaired of.

"I could get no relief from doctors nor from the numberless heart and nerve remedies I tried, because I didn't know that coffee was daily putting me back more than the doctors could put me ahead.

"Finally at the request of a friend I left off coffee and began the use of Postum and against my convictions I gradually improved in health until for the past 6 or 8 months I have been entirely free from nervousness and those terrible sinking, weakening spells of heart trouble.

"My troubles all came from the use of coffee which I had drunk from childhood and yet they disappeared when I quit coffee and took up the use of Postum."

Many people marvel at the effects of leaving off coffee and drinking Postum, but there is nothing marvelous about it—only common sense.

Coffee is a destroyer—Postum is a rebuilder. That's the reason.

Questions and Answers

Anonymous communications cannot receive attention in "Our Mail-Bag."

B. A., Hollywood, Calif. 1. Why did not President Taft take the oath of office on the Bible which the other Presidents had used? 2. Of what religion is Mrs. Taft?

1. There is no one Bible on which the Presidents take the oath of office. Each President furnishes, or has furnished, a special Bible for the occasion, and the Bible then remains in the possession of the President's family as an heirloom. President Taft used the Bible of the United States Supreme Court for the reason that it had always been his ambition to be a member of that court. It was a matter of sentiment with him, but a fine one, to use the Bible of the highest judicial body in the land. 2. Mrs. Taft is a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

Mrs. E. C. M., Claremont, Ill. Are there any saved outside of the Church?

Yes. God has his witnesses in all lands and in every nation. The light and power of the Holy Spirit can make themselves felt in the midst of a desert, or in the remote islands of the seas. The Church, however, is the ordained organized means of grace, and none should neglect it. For any one who is within a reasonable distance of a church to neglect attendance, is to miss a great privilege and a great blessing, and possibly to miss what is far more precious than life itself—the jewel of salvation.

Reader, Babylon, N. Y. If a man and his wife have a joint account in a savings bank, credited jointly in the bank book and subject to withdrawal without question by either, in the event of the death of either does the survivor rightfully and legally own the whole amount of money, heirs or no heirs?

We referred your letter to our attorney, Mr. G. H. Crawford, and herewith give his reply: "On the facts stated, the presumption would be very strong in favor of the survivor taking the whole. Facts might exist, however, to rebut the presumption, but such facts must be clearly proved and must demonstrate that the intention of the parties in creating the account excluded the right of survivorship."

Reader, Newville, N. D. Why do you serve the Bread Line at such an early hour—1 A.M.?

Because the men who form the Bread Line, as a rule, have no home or lodging and the one o'clock service of food makes a cheering break in the monotony of the long, cold night. It gives them strength and courage to face the ordeal of the coming day and to go out and seek work. We consider it the best hour that could have been chosen for the purpose.

F. B. R., Jamestown, Mo. Is it safe to obey conscience in deciding between right and wrong?

Not always. There is such a thing as a seared and dulled conscience—one that is practically dead. Such a conscience, through long toleration of evil courses, has become practically unable to distinguish right from wrong and has ceased its functions as an inward mentor. It needs to be quickened, and the heart renewed and regenerated by the Holy Spirit, before the conscience can be trusted again as a guide to decide between right and wrong. See our MAIL-BAG for May 5, 1909, for answer to your other question.

Reader, Saratoga Springs, N. Y. 1. Should we teach that regeneration, pardon, justification and adoption are simultaneous in point of time and operation? 2. May we teach that to be sanctified is to be made holy, and to be set apart for sacred use, subsequent to justification?

1. Farrar very concisely answers this. He writes: "The sinner is convinced of sin by the Holy Spirit; he exercises a penitent faith in Christ as his Saviour; God immediately justifies him; the Holy Spirit attests the fact of his forgiveness by shedding abroad the love of God in the heart, and all things become new." Conversion is "that change in the thoughts, desires, dispositions and life of the sinner which is the result of the Holy Spirit entering the heart by the exercise of saving faith in the atonement." Regeneration is the work of the Spirit in the transformation of the whole nature of the converted one. It is the recovery of the moral image of God and the awakening of new spiritual life. It is wholly an act of God's grace and differs from conversion in that it is a receptive work altogether. Adoption, in the early church, was held to be the result of baptism. Now, it is held as following justification as a logical sequel; for if sin deprived us of our sonship, forgiveness restores it. 2. Yes. Sanctification is the process of being purged, purified and set aside for service. It is usually a gradual process. Natural instincts and passions are chastened and restrained, and sin becomes hateful and the soul becomes less and less subject to "voluntary transgressions of known law." There are various views on "entire sanctification," but these need not be discussed here.

Mrs. E. G., Massachusetts. 1. Could a person be regarded as a Christian who has never been baptized or received into any church? 2. Could one, though baptized but a non-attendant of any church, be considered a Christian?

1. Baptism is one of the sacred ordinances of the Christian Church and should not be neglected. In most denominations, if not all, it is regarded as indispensable to full fellowship, although there may be some churches that admit to membership without this. 2. There is a specific injunction laid upon Christians not to "forsake the assembling of themselves" together for purposes of prayer and worship. It seems to us that one would be a very sorry Christian indeed who held the privileges of Christian fellowship so lightly that he would not go to church. Besides, he would certainly miss the blessing that comes of confessing Christ before men. In the case of a chronic invalid, or one who is absolutely prevented from attending by causes beyond his control, this criticism would not apply.

J. R., Sauk Centre, Minn. Did Lew Wallace have historical facts other than the Bible for his story of Ben-Hur?

Lew Wallace was a great student of the Bible and the history and customs of Palestine and the East. The lives of most of the characters are imaginary, but the historical setting is accurate. A number of the characters are really historical. In regard to Ben-Hur himself we have no information.

M. D. R., Creston, Ia. I understand that Philander C. Knox was deriving about $100,000 per annum from his law practice. What reason shall we believe caused him to relinquish this and accept a government position of $8,000 yearly?

A patriotic desire to serve the country and the natural desire to hold the next office in importance to the Presidency. With perhaps one exception, every member of the Cabinet gave up an income from his profession and business many times larger than the salary paid to a Cabinet member, in order to serve the country. Mr. Root's income before he became a member of the last Cabinet was larger than that of Mr. Knox. Mr. Knox is willing, as are the others, to make the sacrifice financially, as he feels that the honor is worth more than the money. The great dignity of the position is the recompense, which properly cannot be estimated in dollars and cents.

Friend, Birmingham, Ala. How should a stepmother be treated who does all the work for her family without help, and behaves as nearly right as she knows how?

She should receive respect and kindness from each and every member of her family; but they may not have been taught proper courtesy. Patience and prayer must wear down enmity and rudeness. You are in a hard place, and have our sympathy.

M. M. P., Gainesville, Ky. Please explain Mark 2:21, 22, also Matt. 12:43-45.

The two illustrations in the passage from Mark are simply meant to show the incongruity that would exist were such things to be done.

The Mayor of Naples Greeting Mr. Roosevelt on His Arrival in Italy

AS soon as Mr. Roosevelt stepped ashore at Naples, on his trip to Africa, he was greeted by enthusiastic crowds and a swarm of photographers. One of the best snapshots taken is the one given above. It shows Mr. Roosevelt on his way from the dock being greeted by the Mayor of Naples. Officials as well as the people did all possible to make his stay pleasant. Mr. Roosevelt has now arrived safely in Mombasa, and is already on his way to the interior.

As men's sense leads them to avoid such incongruities in ordinary life, so there are similar incongruities in spiritual things which wise people will shun. This is an important parable. If you will examine Luke 11:21-26, you will find it stated somewhat more fully and in its proper connection. The palace in verse 21 is man's heart; if it is occupied by the power of evil, and a stronger power (the power of righteousness) shall come, it will cleanse the palace and remove the evil. By and by the tempter returns and, in an unguarded moment, the heart is recaptured and the last state of that man is worse than the first. This is the danger that threatens the heart which is not wholly given over to Christ.

The following two questions have been submitted to Rev. C. M. Sheldon, of Topeka, Kan., for answer:

1. Where did Satan come from at the beginning of the world?

1. The Bible does not convey any information on this point. So far as any statement is concerned as to the origin of Satan, there is absolute silence; hence this belongs to that list of questions which have always been asked concerning the origin of evil. The one who asks the question is referred for full discussion of the person of Satan to a good Bible dictionary, which enters into details more fully than space in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will permit. However, there should be no mental trouble over such questions, as it makes no practical difference in our lives how Satan came into existence. Our main business should be to put him out of business as much as possible, and, if we try to do that, it will keep us so busy that we cannot worry over the question of his entering the world.

2. As all souls from our first parents were sinners, how could Jesus, the Son of God, be born of Mary, who was a sinner?

2. If Jesus were to come into the world at all, he must come through some human agency, if he were to be a representative of the race and not an angelic being. The very fact that he was born, as the Bible says, "from a woman" and "born under the law," is a revelation of the great plan of God for the world. He did not assume anything at the beginning which placed him beyond the common experience of every person who is born.

K. R., Galt, Ontario. 1. Who is the present holder of the British title of Buccleuch? 2. What is the original name of the head of the house? 3. Which is older, the Duke of Hamilton or the Duke of Buccleuch? What is the Buccleuch headquarters?

1. The present, the sixth Duke of Buccleuch, in the peerage of Scotland is William Henry Walter Montagu-Douglas-Scott. He holds fifteen other titles, including another dukedom, also a viscounty, several earldoms and baronies. He was born in 1831. 2. The original name of the house was Scott. Sir Walter Scott, the author, was a descendant of a branch of the family. 3. The Dukedom of Hamilton is the oldest. It was created in 1643; the Dukedom of Buccleuch was created in 1663. Buccleuch has seven residences. His principal Scotch seat is Dalkeith Palace. See Burke's Peerage of Great Britain and Ireland.

Reader, Drayton, N. D. When did General Israel Putnam, of the Revolutionary Army, die? Did he leave an estate?

At the close of the war General Israel Putnam retired to his farm at Pomfret, Conn. He died May 29, 1790. He left a comfortable estate. See Livingston's Life of Israel Putnam, published in 1901.

There is little danger of a power plant being struck by lightning, the fact that there is so much electricity in the air diffuses the charge and renders it incapable of much damage. In large cities, where there are electric lights and numerous power plants it is seldom that a bolt is known to strike. In the case of a telephone, it is best to disconnect the wires during a storm, if possible. If this cannot be done, omit telephoning while a storm is in progress, as the person is liable to receive at least a slight shock, though there is small probability of damage being done to the house.

EIGHTEENTH CONGRESS OF THE D. A. R.

By WALDON FAWCETT

THE Eighteenth Continental Congress of the Daughters of the American Revolution will be remembered as one of the most remarkable of the annual gatherings of this unique national organization of women.

Spirited contests for the elective offices aroused intense interest. There was mingled gratification and surprise over the rapid growth of the organization, as evidenced by the presence at the Congress of 1,401 delegates, to say nothing of from 4,000 to 5,000 Daughters, who, though not regularly accredited delegates, were impelled by their interest in the national body to journey to Washington and attend the sessions of the Congress as spectators.

After all, however, the history-making events of the 1909 annual reunion of the world's greatest feminine patriotic society revolved for the most part around what might be termed the informal dedication of Continental Hall, a marble memorial structure, the first building of its class ever erected to the memory of patriotic men and which represents the fruits of the first and only project of the kind ever carried out by women. Continental Hall, which is located little more than a stone's throw from the White House at Washington, has been under construction for several years, and last year's Congress of the D. A. R. was held in the partially completed building; but the gathering of 1909 was the first at which the women have had the benefit of a fully completed home. Even now, there are a few finishing touches to be placed on the exterior; but the interior of the white palace is virtually finished, and this spring the Daughters take possession permanently.

Mrs. Donald McLean, who has been President-General of the Daughters of the American Revolution for several years past and presided at this spring's Congress for the last time in that capacity, informally dedicated Continental Hall. This was eminently appropriate, for the "mausoleum of memory," as Mrs. McLean calls it, has long been the pet project of this resourceful, energetic woman. It was largely through her management of the financial details that the completion of the building was hastened. Hon. James Schoolcraft Sherman, Vice-President of the United States; J. J. Jusserand, Ambassador of France to the United States; Bishop Harding, and other prominent men co-operated with Mrs. McLean in the dedicatory exercises.

In her address to the Daughters, assembled from all sections of the United States, Mrs. McLean dwelt at length upon the development of the Memorial Hall project, detailing how it grew from a plan to have a comparatively modest $100,000 building until it has culminated this year in the creation of an imposing monumental structure, which represents an expenditure of more than $500,000. She congratulated her sisters upon the large auditorium, the fine museum hall, the hall of records and other features of the interior and added, humorously: "Just to show that women planned all this, we have provided, upstairs, the biggest kitchen and the best range you ever saw."

Leaving Continental Hall After a Session of the Congress

Incidentally there was manifestation of pride over the inclusion of thirteen monoliths, donated by the thirteen original States of the Union, most of these columns having been purchased from State funds by authorization of the various State Legislatures.

The reports of the various officers, submitted at the Congress, emphasized the phenomenal growth of this exclusively feminine organization, which now enrolls more than 72,000 women—descendants of the men who fought the War for Independence.

During the past year, more than 6,000 new members were admitted, nineteen of this number being "real Daughters." Since the last Continental Congress, five hundred and seventy Daughters of the Revolution have died, including twenty-three "real Daughters," which serves to indicate how rapidly the nation is losing the next of kin to the patriots who founded the republic. Indeed, to pursue this subject further, it may be noted that only 223 "real Daughters" are now living out of 687 who have belonged to the society since it was founded, eighteen years ago.

The Daughters of the American Revolution make up the one country-wide community wherein women engage in political activities, with all the aggressiveness and enthusiasm displayed by men when engrossed in Presidential and Congressional campaigns. The feminine contests for ballots, every second year, are most interesting. At these intervals, leading officials, including a President-General, are elected. The contest this year was unusually exciting. Under the laws of the society, Mrs. McLean was ineligible to re-election as President-General and she threw the weight of her influence and support to Mrs. Matthew T. Scott, of Illinois, who became known, in consequence, as the "administration candidate." Opposed to her, as the "insurgent" or anti-administration candidate for the highest office in the gift of the women, was Mrs. William Cumming Story, of New York. Throughout the congress this year there were numerous animated parliamentary skirmishes, such as have made D. A. R. Congresses in the past interesting to the world at large. Mrs. Matthew T. Scott was elected President-General of the society by a majority of eight votes.

HINDRANCES TO PRAYER

TEXT—James 4 · 2, 3

I WISH to study the Bible with you this morning in order that we may discover what it is that hinders our prayers.

First. The first hindrance to prayer we find right in the text: "Ye ask amiss that ye may consume it upon your lusts," or, as the Revised Version renders it, "That ye may spend it in your pleasures." There is a selfish motive in our prayer; we are seeking a blessing that terminates in ourselves. What should be our motive in prayer? First of all, and above all else, that God may be glorified by answering our prayer. Paul tells us in I. Cor. 10:31, "Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." God's glory should be our supreme motive in all we do, even in such little matters as eating and drinking. Then certainly it should be our first and controlling motive in prayer. We should ask for the thing that we ask, not so much that we may get the blessing as that God may be glorified in granting the blessing. When we pray in that way, God will give us what we ask of him. There is many a Christian woman praying for the conversion of her husband. That certainly is a proper prayer. I do not see how any Christian woman can rest until her husband is converted. Why should she pray for the conversion of her husband? First of all, and above all else, in order that God may be glorified in the conversion of her husband. Because she cannot bear the thought that God should be any longer dishonored by the godless, Christless life of her husband. How far this is from the thought of many a woman who is praying for the conversion of her husband is evident from the way in which she speaks to you about it. The wife will come to you and say, "I wish you would pray for the conversion of my husband. He is not a Christian, but he is really such a good man." But when you get to the place where you are so occupied with the glory of God that you cannot bear it that your husband should remain a day longer a rebel against God, and cry to God to convert your husband, first of all and above all in order that he may be glorified in your husband's giving up his rebellion and becoming a true child of God, you will soon see your husband converted.

Praying for a Revival

There are many ministers and church members praying for a revival. That is certainly a right prayer. The Bible itself warrants us in praying for revival. (Ps. 85:6, "Wilt thou not revive us again: that thy people may rejoice in thee?") Indeed, I cannot see how any Christian who has an open eye to the present condition of the church and the world can rest satisfied without a revival. It seems to me as if every intelligent Christian must pray day and night for revival, but much prayer for revival is purely selfish. We pray for revival because we think a revival would build up our church, that it would bring new members into our church, that it would increase the finances of the church and perhaps help us erect a new church building, or for some other reason similar to these. Now this is pure selfishness, and a holy God cannot and will not listen to a prayer offered to him from such a motive. Why should we pray for revival? First of all, in order that God may be glorified in the conversion of sinners and by the professing church being raised to a higher level of Christian living. Because we cannot endure it that God should any longer be dishonored by the low level of living so common among professing Christians to-day, by the Church's compromise with the world, by the stubborn unbelief of sinners, by the rampant infidelity abroad in the land, because our hearts are burdened and overwhelmed with a desire for God's glory in a genuine revival of religion. When we get to praying for revival along this line, it will not be long before we see it.

Baptism of the Holy Spirit

Many, both ministers and others, are praying for the baptism with the Holy Spirit. That certainly in itself is a prayer that is well pleasing to God. Jesus himself taught us to pray for the Holy Spirit (Luke 11:13, "If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?") But much prayer for the baptism with the Holy Spirit is purely selfish. You meet others who have been baptized with the Holy Spirit, and when you see their radiant joyfulness you wish that joyfulness, too. You see those whom you once knew as being powerless and ineffective Christians now baptized with the Holy Spirit entering into a new experience of power in service for Christ, and you wish the baptism with the Holy Spirit in order that you may become an effective worker and obtain a reputation for your efficiency in service. Now, let us ask ourselves: Why ought we to pray for the baptism with the Holy Spirit? Because we cannot endure it that God should be any longer dishonored by our life of failure and defeat; in order that God may be glorified in our leading a life of daily victory; in order that God may be glorified by our becoming effective servants for him. When we get to praying for the baptism with the Spirit from that motive it will not be long before we receive it.

Sin a Hindrance to Prayer

Second. We find the second hindrance to prayer in Isa. 59:1, 2, "Behold, the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save; neither his ear heavy, that it cannot hear. But your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid his face from you, that he will not hear." The people of Isaiah's time came to Isaiah and said, "God no longer answers prayer. He may have answered prayer in the days of Moses and the days of Elijah, but he does not answer it now. Either his ear is heavy that it cannot hear, or his hand is shortened that it cannot save." "No, no," replied Isaiah, "the ear of God is just as quick to hear prayer as it ever was. His hand is just as long and just as strong to save, but your iniquities have separated between you and your God and your sins have hid his face from you that he will not hear." Here we find a second hindrance to prayer —sin. If you are praying for something and not getting it, do not conclude that God no longer hears prayer, do not even conclude that it is not the will of God to give you the particular thing for which you are asking; go alone with God, ask him to search your heart and to show you if there is anything in your heart or life that prevents his answering your prayer at this time. Some years ago, in the city of Minneapolis, I was depending entirely and directly upon God for every penny that came to me for the support of myself and family and for the support of my work. I had cut off all former sources of income; I took up no collections and no subscriptions, made no appeals of any kind for money; went to God and God alone and told him my need. Many were watching the experiment; some sympathetically, and possibly some unsympathetically with the desire that it would fail. I came to the place one day where I must have money at once or close up the work; for I had taken the ground that I would not run in debt a penny for a single day, for running in debt is not faith but disobedience to God. The time was at hand and the money had not come. I went home that night with fear and trembling. Would God fail me? Would the money not come? I knelt down and asked God very definitely and earnestly for the money, but got no assurance of an answer. I went to bed.

A Heartsearching Experience

I awoke in the middle of the night very sick and in great pain and distress. The very billows of hell seemed to be going over my head. The treasured faith of years seemed to be on the verge of being swept away. Out of the depths I cried unto God, but there was no answer. Then I said, "O God, if there is anything wrong in my life anywhere show me what it is and I will give it up." Something came up that had often come up before, but every time it would come up I would say to myself, "It is all right; it is not wrong; it is all nonsense to say it is wrong," and would seek to assure myself it was right while in the bottom of my heart all the time I knew it was wrong. Have you anything of that kind in your life that, every now and then, comes up to trouble you, and whenever it comes up you say to yourself, "It is right; it is all right; I know it is right," but all the time in the bottom of your heart you know it is wrong? Well, it came up again. I cried, "O God, if this thing is wrong, I will give it up." There was no answer. Again I looked up and said, "O God, this thing is wrong; it is sin, and I will give it up now." The heavens were no longer like brass. God was there. My pain left me. I fell asleep and slept like a child till morning. I wakened the next morning as well as I am this moment, the money came and everything went on all right when I judged my sin. O my brother, if God is not answering your prayers, search your own heart and life and see if there is not something wrong there; confess it, put it away and the answer will come.

Modern Idolatry

Third. You will find the third hindrance to prayer in Ezek. 14:1-3. It was a glad day for Ezekiel when he saw the leaders of his people around him, looking to him to inquire of God for them. But Ezekiel's joy was short, for God said, "Ezekiel, these men have set up their idols in their hearts. Don't pray for them. I will not listen to them." Idols in the heart prevent God from answering our prayers. In India and China, and other heathen lands, they set up their idols in their temples and in their houses. In Israel and here in America we set them up in our hearts. What is an idol? An idol is anything that a man puts before God. Many a man makes an idol of his wife. No man can love his wife too much; the more truly he loves God, the more deeply and earnestly will he love his wife. But a man can put his wife in the wrong place. He can put his wife before God. He can do things to please his wife that he knows are displeasing to God. In like manner many a wife makes an idol of her husband. No wife can love her husband too much. The more truly she loves God, the more intensely she will love her husband, but she can put her husband before God and do things to please her husband which she knows in her heart are not pleasing to God. How many a Christian wife to-day is doing things in domestic life and in social life to please her husband which she knows are displeasing to God! We can make idols of our children. How many of us are doing things to please our children that we know are displeasing to God! Others make an idol of reputation. This is a temptation that comes especially to us who are in the ministry. We who are in the ministry to-day know perfectly well that, no matter how scholarly a man may be, if he holds to the old doctrines many will say that he is not a thinker, that he is not up to date, that he is "medieval" and "archaic"; and, on the other hand, we know that, no matter how little real education one may have, if he just seeks to discredit the integrity of the Bible and rejects some of the fundamental truths of the Book, he will at once obtain a great reputation for originality, breadth and advanced scholarship. We know also very well that if we preach the Gospel with ornate rhetoric and studied arts of oratory, we will get a great reputation as pulpit orators, but we will not have many conversions. On the other hand, if we preach the Gospel with simplicity, directness and in the power of the Holy Spirit, we will see many converted, but critics will sneeringly say, "That man is no orator," and the temptation comes, for our reputation's sake, to preach the Gospel "with enticing words of man's wisdom and not in demonstration of the Spirit and of power." If we yield to this temptation, we make an idol of our reputation and God will not hear our prayers.

The Unforgiving Spirit

Fourth. You will find another hindrance to prayer in Mark 11:25. Jesus here tells us that an unforgiving spirit will prevent God's answering our prayers. All of God's answering our prayers is on the ground of his dealing with us as forgiven sinners, but how can God deal with us as forgiven sinners when we are not forgiving those who have sinned against us? Very few realize how many prayers are hindered by an unforgiving spirit. Wives are praying for the conversion of their husbands, and crying to God day and night for their conversion, but no answer comes. Why? The wife

TRAINING WOMEN FOR LIFE WORK

PROBABLY the most unique college in the United States is Simmons College, in the Back Bay Fens of Boston. It is an institution of university standard, established with the sole purpose of enabling women to perfect themselves in such of the arts, sciences and industries as shall better enable them to be self-supporting. That is to say, the fundamental idea is that women shall here have opportunity for qualifying as experts in any livelihood line, be it typewriting or chemistry, lace needlework or electrical engineering. Whatever a woman wishes to study or perfect herself in, be it a department in which she desires and expects to make her living or any special branch of study, it is intended that Simmons College shall furnish the means.

It is the only advanced school of the kind in the country. There are many technical schools of elementary grade in their specialties, but none other than Simmons of college standard. That this is appreciated is shown in the fact that during the past year (the second year of its inception) there have been 545 women from all sections of the United States in attendance as students at Simmons. It is located in a specially constructed building out in the Back Bay Fens and near Mrs. Jack Gardner's famous "Italian palace," noted for its art treasures, and the new buildings of the Harvard University Medical School. The region is, in fact, the new educational centre of Boston, the past few years having witnessed a remarkable grouping in this Back Bay section of new educational and art institutions. Here in close proximity to Simmons College are the headquarters of the Boston Normal School, the Girls' High School of Commerce, the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston Museum of Fine Arts, Boston Grand Opera House, Horticultural Hall and Symphony Hall. Thus the women students at Simmons are favored with the advantages for acquaintance with the social and artistic benefits of the neighboring schools and colonies of students in the arts.

Simmons College is due to the late John Simmons, a wealthy Bostonian, who determined that the humanitarian phase of his fortune should go to the advancement of working women. In his will, he made noble provisions to this end. Dr. William Sedgwick, for long president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, was one of the principal organizers of the new Simmons College, and gathered about him an able board of co-workers. Dr. William Lefavor, an experienced educator, was secured as president of the institution, and the opening, in spite of the enthusiasm of the brilliant managers, was viewed by many as a doubtful experiment. Actual two-year test has, however, proven beyond question that the Simmons College idea is a thorough success.

The New Simmons College Building

The system of admission is this: The successful applicant has shown that she has completed the fourth year of work in one of the various schools of the country approved as of sufficient grade (exactly as certain academies and fitting schools carry their graduates, by diploma, into the freshman classes of Harvard, Yale and Princeton). This is absolutely necessary, for, as has been stated, Simmons is a college, and not an elementary institution. Once admitted, the new student is free to study political economy, modern languages, typewriting, library work, sewing, cooking, domestic science, chemistry, electricity, physics, or any science that will better enable her to earn her living.

The work at the college is carried on in certain branches with co-operation of other institutions. For instance, there is a scholarship maintained in connection with the Boston Cooking School Corporation. Another is conducted in connection with the Massachusetts General Hospital and Children's Hospital. This is the course for training as nurses.

Thus the young woman who is already an expert in typewriting and stenography can come here and study law, so as to enable her to secure a suitable position in, say, the legal department of a great railroad or manufacturing enterprise. The woman who is an expert in business management can come to Simmons and prepare herself for conducting a mining company. Educators and philanthropists, who have watched the experiment with interest, now regard Simmons as one of the most individual and valuable of American educational institutions.

HINDRANCES TO PRAYER ✻ Sermon by Rev. R. A. TORREY, D.D.

has in her heart some grudge or bitterness toward some other woman who has wronged her, or who she fancies has wronged her. Woman, cast that bitterness out now. Many a mother is praying for the conversion of her son. Oh, how she cries to God; how her heart aches, but she sees no answer to her prayer. Look into your own heart and see if the reason is not there. Is there any bitterness in your heart toward some one? No matter how grievously that one has wronged you, put away that bitterness to-day.

The Plaint of the Poor

Fifth. You will find the fifth hindrance to prayer in Prov. 21:13: "Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he also shall cry himself, but shall not be heard." Here God tells us distinctly that he will not hear our prayers if we are selfish and mean and stingy in our giving. If we listen to the poor when they cry to us, God will listen to our prayers when we cry to him. But if we turn a deaf ear to the poor when they cry to us, God will turn a deaf ear to us when we cry to him. I believe that right here we find the explanation of why it is many of our prayers are unanswered. We are not giving as we ought to give. All through the Bible God's greatest promises to us are conditioned upon our giving out to others. Look, for example, at Luke 6:38. God measures to us with the same measure that we measure out to others. God puts his benefactions in through the same door that we give our benefactions out, and many of us open the door such a wee crack that God cannot get anything but a wee blessing in to us. The great prayers have always been the great givers. The mightiest man of prayer, as far as is generally known of our generation, was George Muller, of Bristol, England. In the course of his long life he received over $7,400,000 in answer to prayer. But why did God answer his prayers so abundantly? Because he was an abundant giver. Nothing ever stuck to his fingers. He would ask of God and receive, and pass it on to others. He would ask again and receive, and pass it on to others, and though $7,400,000 passed through his hands it all passed through. When he came to die, he had only enough left to bury him. Look at that wonderful promise that we are so fond of quoting in Phil. 4:19: "But my God shall supply all your need according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus." An elder in our church in Chicago once rose in the prayer meeting and said, "I am glad there is one promise in the Bible without a condition," and then quoted Phil. 4:19. I at once said, "Hold on, brother, there is a condition. It is found in the context. Look back to the fifteenth verse, 'Now ye Philippians know also that in the beginning of the Gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with me as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only. For even in Thessalonica, ye sent once and again unto my necessity.'" Then Paul goes on to tell how they had just sent again to his need. It is then that he says, "And my God shall supply all your need." In other words, God would supply (fulfil—fill full) every need of the church that gave like that. A stingy man, or a stingy church, has no business whatever to claim that promise.

Turn now to another passage, I. John 3:22: "And whatsoever we ask we receive of Him, because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight." John here makes a remarkable statement, that whatever he asked he got. Why? Because he kept His commandments and did those things that were pleasing in his sight. But what commandments? Look at the context. Begin back at the sixteenth verse: "Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren. But whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" (John is talking about giving; generous giving; giving everything that we have, if need be, when we see a brother in need.) But read on: "My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue; but in deed and in truth." Oh, there is so much loving in word and in tongue, and not in deed; that is, in doing, and in truth—that is, in reality. But let us read on still: "Hereby [that is, by loving in deed and in truth, by generous giving] shall we know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before Him. For if our heart condemn us [that is, in the matter of giving], God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things. Beloved, if our heart condemn us not [that is, in the matter of giving], then have we confidence toward God, and whatsoever we shall ask we receive of him." Here we find the secret of much ineffective prayer: we are not giving as we ought to give. We are wondering to-day why God is not more abundantly answering the prayers of the Church in our land. Let us look at our giving. The evangelical Christians of America are not giving on the average two cents per member a week for foreign missions. Is it any wonder God does not answer our prayers? Christian women are spending more every year of their lives on the single article of kid gloves than they are upon sending the Gospel to the perishing heathen. I am not saying that women should not wear gloves, but I am saying they should certainly give more to send the Gospel to the perishing than they do on the matter of personal adornment. And how about the men? every year of his life on the filthy tobacco, which at Many a professedly Christian man is spending more the best does not do him good and certainly makes him a nuisance to many others, than he is upon sending the Gospel to those in darkness and dying.

The Wrong Kind of Home Life

Sixth. You will find the sixth hindrance to prayer in I. Pet. 3:7: "Likewise ye husbands, dwell with them according to knowledge, giving honor unto the wife, as unto the weaker vessel, and as being heirs together of the grace of life; that your prayers be not hindered." Note the closing words, "that your prayers be not hindered." Here the Spirit of God tells us by Peter that a wrong treatment of a wife by a husband and, of course, vice versa, a wrong treatment of a husband by a wife, hinders prayer. If we would know why it is that many of our prayers are not answered we should look into our home life. How many a man there is in our churches to-day, who, if we should hear him speak in prayer meeting, we would think was almost an angel, but if we watch his conduct at home we would think him something else. He is overbearing, domineering, harsh.

Many a wife in public is almost angelic. In prayer meeting she is seraphic, but at home it is all different. She is cross, peevish, nagging. Her husband goes home at night weary from his work. Now, God forbid that I should justify any man, under any circumstances, in frequenting saloons; but I know that many a man is driven there because his wife has made his home a little hell; and that woman wonders why her prayers are not answered. Look again: here is a woman who has been married a few months, or a few years. Not long ago, when one young man was coming to the house at night, she tried to make herself more attractive than if any one else was coming, but it is all changed now. They are married now. Ah, men and women, if we are to have power in prayer, we should be lovers always. I saw a question in a ladies' journal not long ago: "How long ought the honeymoon to last?" It ought to last as long as life lasts. Then we can have power in prayer. If you would have power in prayer, spread your whole married life out before the all-seeing eye of God and say, "Heavenly Father, if there is anything here anywhere that is displeasing in thy sight, point it out and I will give it up," and when God points it out, give it up and then you will have power in prayer.

These are the things that hinder prayer. Shall we have done with them to-day? If we will, we can come into the presence of our heavenly Father, and there will be nothing too large to ask of him, and he will give it.

THE "DRY WAVE" STILL SPREADING

By KATE UPSON CLARK

IN spite of the fact that many influences were at work for the recent Brough bill in New York, which permitted the Sunday opening of saloons from 11 A.M. to 11 P.M., the great majority of temperance workers rejoiced over its defeat in the State Legislature. It was killed in obedience to the imperative demand of the respectable element throughout the State, which said "No!" to the proposition to give over the Sabbath to the rumsellers.

The argument for the bill is the old one, that the saloons are virtually open all day Sunday under present conditions, thus bringing the law into disrepute; and that, so long as the rich men's clubs are allowed to sell liquor freely on Sunday, the poor men will never submit to laws which take away their right to drink also.

Still, the great mass of our conscientious people cannot bring themselves to the point of legally consenting to the Sunday sale of liquor. They believe that the law as it stands, which absolutely prohibits the sale of liquor on Sunday, can be enforced. Commissioner Bingham insists that a special force of excise policemen would be needed for the purpose, in addition to the regular body. This is denied by many of those best informed. Private drinking they cannot control. Public drinking they can and should.

In spite of the prayers and labors of the temperance women of Long Island, and the help of a few devoted men, the eastern counties of Suffolk and Nassau voted, on April 6, for license. Possibly many temperance men who are really interested did not work their hardest, because they felt that the great success of the "dry" movement elsewhere insured its triumph in their own community. The liquor men depended upon no such airy aid. They went into the battle vigorously, and spent much money. Thus "the strongest battalions" won.

Few of us realize the enormous strength of this new prohibition wave. The South is, legally, almost wholly "dry." The demoralization of their great population of untaught blacks has driven them to this point. If their good laws now on the books could only be enforced, drunkenness, and with it a horde of other vices, would be practically wiped out from that section. As it is, the "blind tiger" is far too common, and the authorities seem helpless to suppress it. In Maryland, Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee and Kentucky a large majority of the counties have forbidden liquor selling. By means of so-called "near beer" and "uno," two beverages containing so little alcohol as to fall outside of the law, saloons, social "clubs," "speakeasies," "boot-leggers" and moonshiners, and similar evasions of the law are freely practiced. The negroes drink Jamaica ginger, and even perfumes, when they can get nothing better. "The vilest decoctions," says the New York Sun, "are sold under the name of whisky, in defiance not only of the State law, but of the national pure food law as well. In the West, the movement has been quite as far reaching and much more thoroughly enforced. "Liquor men," says one authority, "seem dazed by the force of the blow which local option has dealt their business in these States."

Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Minnesota, Iowa and Missouri are a on the "dry list." In some of these States property-holders are complaining of the high taxes rendered necessary by the loss of the license money. The Anti-Saloon Leagues insist that the reduction in police, court and public institution expenses, following the closing of the saloons, will soon lessen taxation. In some of the States the new order has practically cut in two the number of arrests for drunkenness.

In some sections the church people have interested themselves to find new business for the liquor dealers who have been thrown out of work, thus preventing the secret continuance of their former business.

Another interesting phase of the movement is that grocers, dry goods and other merchants throughout the "dry" sections report more cash sales and better collections. This was an inevitable result of a well-enforced prohibition law, but many business men were not bright enough to see it until it came.

High fines greatly help this enforcement. A druggist in Oregon, Mo., was recently fined $6,200 and sentenced to one year in jail for violation of the local option law. Similar fines demanded in other States have had a salutary effect.

Maine and Vermont, especially the former, have been "prohibition" States for some years, but no concerted effort has been made in either for the honest enforcement of the law. Vermont's new local option law has worked better than the old State-wide prohibition.

The large cities in every State are the prime enemies of prohibition. In no one of them has it been possible to enforce even a ward or district law forbidding the sale of liquor. In some of the great Western cities, notably St. Louis, Mo., the Sunday closing law is said to be vigorously executed.

Our people, all over the country, need more instruction along this line, and even more do they need the godly zeal which knows neither weariness nor discouragement. These recent temperance triumphs should inspire us with confidence for the future of the cause of temperance.

JOSEPH RATCLIFFE, Baltic, Conn.

Of course this is an out-and-out Boy's proposition, and it is hard to see where a girl could come in on it, unless, perhaps, she has a brother with an important birthday in the near future and would like to make him an A1 present, that will materially enhance his admiration for "sister." But we will have something of more general interest to our Girls next week. In the meantime, Boys, "make a sprint," as the phrase goes, after more business and earn one or all of the pieces in our Ball Game Set. Each piece is the very best of its kind and, if you have that enthusiasm for our National Game which seems to be born in most of our young men, you will feel repaid for your efforts twice over. A Glowing Testimonial

Dear Christian Herald: I am writing to thank you for the premiums which you sent me with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The Art Gallery alone should be sufficient inducement as a premium to hold any old subscriber; it is beautiful. The other premium, After Death—What? is easily worth the whole amount that I sent you. The only way that I can fully express myself is to say that I really feel greatly indebted to you. Yours very truly,

MRS. J. H. WIENAND.

GREAT BATTLE IN CONSTANTINOPLE

AST fall the political situation in Turkey, ominous as it for a time ppeared, seemed on a fair ay to peaceful settlement. A few months have assed and again Turkey in a turmoil, one portion f the army has been arayed against another, mposed of fanatics who ished to re-establish the upremacy of the Moslems ver the other creeds of the ountry, and the Sultan imself found his tenure pon the Yildiz throne ncertain and skilfully greed with both parties t times. One day it would e reported that he was eady to flee on a Russian an-of-war to escape from is precarious situation; hen he would be making peeches to a portion of the roops, who would cheer im enthusiastically. Then ame a mutiny. Soldiers f Salonica marched on the ity to suppress the mutineers. The city was attacked and a fierce battle raged within Constantinople.

Constantinople, where a Battle Was Fought on April 24, Between Young Turks and Reactionists

At first there was an uprising of anatical troops in Constantinople to orce a reassertion of Mohammedan nilitary superiority, thus nullifying, n part, the constitution. The second uprising started at Salonica to support he constitution at whatever cost.

The chief motive of the Constantinople mutiny was religious, though he antecedent causes were the excessive demands made by the Young Turks.

The government had announced its ntention of enlisting Christians, as vell as Mohammedans, in the army, nd this aroused intense indignation among the Moslem troops of the capital. It has always been the rule that the army should be composed of followers of the prophet, and that the Christians should pay a heavy tax in place of military service. Recently the Armenians and others declared that they would rather serve. It was thought impossible to form exclusively Christian regiments, so it was planned to mix them with the Moslems. The religious fanatics at once raised the alarm that the very foundations of Islam were being undermined, and incited the troops to revolt.

The government and the Committee of Union and Progress of the Young Turk party knew of this agitation, but felt they could depend on the officers, and this proved true. But the surprise came when the revolt broke out, led by a sergeant. They demanded the restoration of Kiamel Pasha and the laws of Islam. They marched to the Sultan's palace and cheered him until he appeared at the window and made a conciliatory speech, in which he said that their demands had been granted and that the Islamic law should be preserved. The troops, wild with joy, fired off their guns in salute, whereat the Sultan disappeared and the troops proceeded forthwith to take possession of the city.

The parliament at once was in a state of panic and only eight deputies attended, not enough for a quorum. The troops looted two newspaper offices belonging to the Young Turk party, and there was a clash between the insurgents and some loyal troops, several being killed and forty wounded as a result. Parliament seemed to be partly under the thumb of the Sultan and partly under a small faction of the New Turk Party, which has recently been carrying things with a high hand. A new ministry was formed, and the Islamic law proclaimed in a message to the deputies in which the Sultan urged the troops and the people to return to their duties. This message was received by the members of the Parliament with cheers. The revolution contained so many diverse elements that it was difficult at first to see directly at whom it was aimed. The Sultan does not seem to have been considered, except so far as he was a coreligionist with the fanatics; they evidently aimed at the Committee of Union and Progress.

Then came the second uprising in support of a free parliament and the constitution. Niazi Bey telegraphed the Sultan he must support the constitution. The news created the wildest excitement among the troops at Salonica, where the other revolution which brought constitutional government was started. Niazi Bey had charge of the arrangements for sending on the forces, and the plans were carried out without a hitch. Niazi, it will be remembered, was the chief insurgent to bring the Sultan to consent to a constitution at the time of last year's uprising. Enver Bey, his corevolutionist, again appeared at the front. Regiment after regiment was entrained and rushed to a point eighteen miles from Constantinople, within easy striking distance, if it were necessary to storm the walls in order to subdue the insurgents.

A committee of deputies went out to negotiate with them. They demanded of the committee the punishment of those responsible for the revolt and the restoration of the cabinet under Hilmi Pasha, and freedom of speech in the chamber. They asked the committee if they could say what they wished in Parliament. Some said "Yes," and as many said "No." "Discover the culprit who started the mutiny," said the leader, "we are ready to crush him, whoever he is."

The real climax of the revolution was reached on April 24. The army of the Young Turks, under the command of General Mahmoud Schefket Pasha, surrounded the city at every available point on the previous day and threw a cordon of troops around the Yildiz Palace. During the night there was intermittent skirmishing. It was at five o'clock on Saturday morning, however, when the real battle began. The palace garrison defended its position fiercely, but the artillery and machine guns of the Young Turks mowed them down, and they were ultimately compelled to surrender. The artillery did great damage to the city. There was fierce fighting in the southwest part of Pera and many buildings collapsed, while others were set on fire. The attacking troops made an assault on the barracks occupied by the royalists, and captured it after a desperate struggle, using cannon.

It is reported that 2,000 were killed in the general battle. Frederick Moore, a correspondent of the New York Sun, was among the wounded. There are various reports about the Sultan, one being to the effect that he has been deposed and another that he had found a refuge on board a Russian vessel. Still another report is that he is a prisoner in the hands of the Young Turk leaders, who are to confer with him concerning his fate. The Sultan's palace garrison was practically exterminated. Although the active fighting ceased after 10 A.M. Saturday, with the exception of occasional scattering artillery fire, it was feared, owing to the comparatively small forces of the constitutionalists, that they might not be able to preserve order in the city should the fanaticism of the large Moslem populace become excited. If the Mohammedans arose, the result might be a frightful massacre.

The Sultan Deposed

On April 27, Abdul Hamid was formally deposed by official decree of Parliament, following the decision of the Sheik-ul-Islam. The Sultan's brother, Mehemmed Rechad Effendi, was proclaimed Sultan under the title of Mehemmed V. The new Sultan was born in Constantinople November 3, 1844.

A REMARKABLE BIBLE CLASS OF TWO HUNDRED MEN IN AN OHIO SUNDAY SCHOOL

THE First M. E. Church of Ashland, O., has a membership of about 800 and a Sunday School enrolment of 1,043. Of this number in the Sunday School nearly 500 are adults. The above picture is a photograph of the W. D. Stein Bible Class, which has an active enrolment of nearly 200 men. Mr. L. A. Williams, a business man, is teacher. On the opposite side of the same room is a class of 140 ladies, taught by the Hon. J. A. McDowell, ex-Congressman and now superintendent of the city schools. The pastor, Rev. B. F. Rhoads, has a class of 65 young men. In addition to these, there are six other adult classes in the school, all organized according to the International Standard. Mr. J. H. Good has been the superintendent of this school for thirty-two years. The initial step in this work among the grown-up people was begun about four years ago by Mr. W. D. Stein, who is now doing efficient work along this line in Kansas. His class has the honor of holding the first certificate issued by the International Sunday School Association to an organized Bible class. Every church in Ashland has large adult classes. The men have organized into a Men's Federation, which has become a great power in religious work and civic righteousness. Last May, at the annual banquet of the Federation, nearly 1,200 men marched. This is remarkable for a city of only 8,000 population. The town has been without saloons for four years, has just completed a $35,000 Y. M. C. A. building, nearly one-half the population is in the church, and more than that number have enrolled in the Sunday Schools. The story of this movement has gone out into the whole Sunday School world and has been the inspiration of a similar movement in other cities. Rev. B. F. Rhoads, pastor of the First Methodist Episcopal Church, has many calls for his address on "A Sample Case of A. B. C. Work." He could use all his time in this work, which is speedily growing.

The Massacres in Turkey

ON the morning of April 24 the Young Turks, leaders of the "constitutional" forces against the forces of the Sultan in Constantinople, by a sharp and decisive fight became masters of the situation. They attacked the capital, cannonaded the Yildiz Kiosk, almost exterminated Abdul Hamid's garrison and literally "smoked out" the Sultan, who, if he has not actually been deposed from the throne, is probably a prisoner, with his ultimate fate yet to be decided. What the next incident in this series of tragic events will be no one can foreshadow. Should the Young Turks be unable to control the Mohammedan populace, Constantinople may yet furnish a tragedy of riot and massacre beside which the brief battle of April 24, with its 2,000 dead, may seem insignificant. Let us hope that the world may be spared the horror of such a possibility.

There is a close connection between the situation in Constantinople and the terrible massacres in Asiatic Turkey. Abdul Hamid is reported to have declared that rather than be ruled by the reformers, known as the Committee of Union and Progress, "he would ruin Turkey." Bribery and corruption have been resorted to, and the united influence of the Yildiz Kiosk and the Mohammedan Church have been directed toward breaking up the reform movement. Religious and racial feelings have been stirred up, and mollahs and softas have been inspired to preach "extermination of the Christians," with the frightful results already witnessed in Asia Minor, where from 15,000 to 20,000 Armenians and other non-Mohammedan subjects have been cruelly slaughtered.

An appeal has reached THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from the American missionaries in Asiatic Turkey, which cannot be allowed to pass unheeded. We are urged to hasten to the relief of the multitudes of starving and homeless men, women and children in Adana, Tarsus, Antioch, Marash, Alexandretta, Aintab and other cities. To us their helplessness presents an immediate duty. At least two of our faithful missionaries have met the death of martyrs in these awful massacres and many more are in deadly peril. Our warships are now on the way to protect them as far as possible. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, on the receipt of the news of the Adana massacre (where 5,000 perished), cabled $250 to the missionaries at Constantinople for quick relief for the Adana survivors. We invite our readers to join us in this work of Christian benevolence to succor the wounded, comfort the sick, clothe the naked and give bread to the hungry ones. Send in your gift for the Adana and Antioch sufferers, and let us do all we can to relieve their deplorable condition. Every gift will be acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Are Our Women Rude?

THE opinion has been lately advanced by some of our social authorities that our girls and women are rude, and growing ruder. From England comes the shocking news that the British maiden is trying to look like "the horrid American Gibson girl." She "tilts her nose up in the air, wears all sorts of ruffles and flounces, high jeweled collars, false puffs and startling hats; drives a motor car; hunts, shoots, goes off for week-end parties unchaperoned, and," worst of all, "cannot blush and cannot fall in love."

Our own Marion Harland has testified that the girls in a certain co-educational institution shock the boys by their rudeness; that women pushing baby carriages monopolize the sidewalks, and will not give room to the passers-by; that saleswomen are not as courteous as salesmen, and that "not one in ten of the women who accept seats from men in the street-cars thanks the man for his courtesy."

These are terrible indictments: but, as Burke said that one cannot indict a whole nation, so we may rightly say that one cannot indict a whole sex. Several observing women, young and old, who have been interviewed upon the subject disagree entirely with these writers. In the first place, the British matron is talking of a relatively small class. Even in those who affect the Gibson pose and put on mannishness the film is usually very thin. Under it all is the gentle, home-loving, "old-fashioned" girl—only she is healthier than she used to be. She has higher spirits, and she isn't kept down and snubbed to death, as she used to be.

Oh, no! The woman of the period has her follies and her weaknesses; but her manners are improving every day. Her ambition in this direction is evidenced by the enormous volume of "etiquette literature" in the women's periodicals. Every backwoods maiden longs to behave well. Manners are seen by even the dullest to be a password to success in many fields. Even those who do not want to behave well are learning to do it. The "logic of events" seems to prove that these observers have described only a small part of the great picture of contemporary manners.

The Vatican on Woman's Rights

THAT the Pope has expressed himself as squarely opposed to women going into politics is interesting news, even though it may not act as a deterrent to the steadily increasing numbers of those who are resolutely facing toward the franchise. "Woman," he says, "can never be man's equal, and cannot therefore enjoy equal rights. Few women would ever desire to legislate, and those who did would only be classed as eccentric." The latter sentence probably best explains the meaning of the utterance: he would not wish to see women in parliament, or in any legislative body, framing laws for a nation or a community, and surrendering or neglecting their domestic sovereignty. There is nothing in the language used that need necessarily be construed as denying woman's claim to representation by the ballot, although it will certainly be a damper to the suffragette movement, especially among Catholic women.

The Stopping of Niagara

DURING the third week of April, one of the most remarkable ice gorges in the history of the Niagara River formed across the stream. The ice was trying to move out of the lake and pass down over the Falls. It came in such masses, however, that the pieces wedged and formed a mass which in places was sixty feet thick. Only a comparatively small amount of water could get through and the Falls no longer echoed with the roar of the cataract.

The situation was one of great danger for all the towns below, for if the obstruction remained for several days it might have such a flood behind it as to sweep away towns and hamlets in its path. The State appealed to the War Department to try and break the ice jam, as one-half of the waterway belongs to Canada. This, it was found, would take too long, and Governor Hughes sent State officials to dynamite the jam. The dynamite had little effect, but a warm rain did much toward melting the ice and sending it down the channel.

The stoppage of the flow of water over Niagara by the ice jam gave people an idea how the Falls will look if further spoliation of its beauty by power companies and commercial enterprises is not prevented. Every effort possible should be made to save one of the greatest wonders of the world to the people of America, to whom it properly belongs. The companies cannot be so much blamed as the weak public sentiment which allows the Falls to be used. The companies would not take the water if the people said "No!"

The Secret of the Stars

OUR knowledge of the starry heavens increases by slow stages. The International Astronomical Congress, now in session in Paris, has just completed a photographic map of the skies, which, it is estimated, will show some 40,000,000 stars, the highest number yet disclosed by human science. M. Renaudet, a distinguished astronomer, announces that recent investigations show that the stellar universe is everywhere in constant motion, and that it is the ultimate hope of every scientist that "the mystery of the constitution of the universe" may yet be unfolded. "Knowest thou the ordinances of the heavens?" was the question asked of Job by the voice in the whirlwind, and it has remained unanswered through all the generations.

> The stars are mansions built by nature's hand
> And haply there the spirits of the blest
> Dwell clothed in radiance ——

was Wordsworth's beautiful expression of a thought and hope that have come to innumerable Christian hearts since the time when the Master himself told us of the "many mansions."

Will it ever be possible to communicate with even the nearest star? Some astronomers seem to think so. Professor Pickering believes that we might be able to signal to Mars—assuming that there are intelligent beings there—by a series of giant mirrors or reflectors, and Flammarion shares the belief. He even asserts that the Martians have already attempted communication with the earth. This, of course, is mere conjecture. Doubtless the heavens will hold their secret fast until the great Architect himself reveals it.

Freedom in Bondage

IF faith is giving up the will to God, abandoning one's self absolutely to Christ, taking him for the Master of the affections and the life, then does not faith deprive the soul of its freedom? We would naturally suppose that when a man surrenders his will to another, puts himself in the hands of another, he must cease to be free. But here is a surprising thing—paradoxical as it may seem—this faith liberates the soul. What is freedom? In a world of law and order, liberty does not mean chaos or anarchy.

What, then, does it mean? An illustration may furnish the answer.

In a certain Southern city you might have seen, not long ago, two magnolia trees, which were planted in the same year. One of them was tall, straight, symmetrical; the leaves were brilliantly green, the flowers were gloriously fresh, white and fragrant. The other tree was dwarfed and bent and one-sided; its leaves were narrow and yellow, and there was no bloom. The cause of this contrast was easy to see. One tree was standing apart, in the square, with plenty of room, air and sunlight. The other was confined and shadowed by the houses, and its roots were cramped by the pavement. One was free, the other was not free. Free to do what? Free from law? The very reverse. One was free to follow its law, the other was not free to follow its law. Every created thing has a divine law, plan, ideal. When let alone, and free to follow that law, that ideal, it reaches perfection. That tall, straight, succulent, blooming, fragrant magnolia was free to follow its law—the other was not free.

Faith moves the soul out into the open. By sinking the human will in the Divine will, faith frees it from the contractions and narrowness and shadows of selfishness and greed and passion, and enables the soul to follow its law, the plan for it of its Maker and Father; and like that unshadowed, air-bathed, sun-kissed magnolia, become all that God intended it to be. That is the freedom of faith. Captivity in Christ is the one perfect liberty. "If the Son shall make you free, ye are free indeed."

Mammoth Church and Building

PLANS are drawn for the construction of a magnificent church and a business building combined, in one of the most thickly populated downtown districts of Pittsburg. This unique building is to be the home site of the First German Evangelical Protestant Church of Pittsburg, which was organized 127 years ago. It will occupy a plot of ground 240x110 feet, and will be bounded by Smithfield Street, Sixth Avenue, Montour Way and Strawberry Alley, and will be accessible from all sides. The church occupies the centre of the structure and the architect has arranged the plans so that the churchly idea shall dominate the building. On either side of the church are two mammoth wings, arranged for business purposes. The building above the sixth to the fourteenth floors, over the church, will all be given over to secular purposes. The department sections of the right and left wings can be occupied by two separate establishments or by one enterprise, as the case might require, as the rear entrance forms a connecting passage. In the latter are located the elevators and stairways for the rear portion of the building, which also gives access to the whole building. The basement is devoted to commercial purposes. An imposing arcade will admit to the office and department sections, as well as convey by its transparent floor natural light to the basement. The power plant is to be installed in the sub-basement. On the fourteenth floor is a large assembly hall, 240x110 feet. The architecture of the church is pure Gothic, while the rest of the building is of the Renaissance type. Three large portals admit to the vestibule, 48 feet wide, while on both sides staircases, eight feet wide, lead to the main floor of the church auditorium. On the floor, level with the street, are the Sunday School rooms and lecture and assembly rooms. The church auditorium is 80 feet wide and receives natural light partly from a mammoth skylight, partly from windows bordering on the light court and mainly from Smithfield Street, where ten immense windows admit direct light to the interior. The main floor contains 860 seats, with two additional galleries, capable of accommodating 290 each. On the sixth floor is to be a mammoth clock and a beautiful chime of bells. The distance is 128 feet from the street to the gable, where an eagle is perched, holding in his talons the American and German flags, a fitting symbol of the history and character of this congregation.

The Most Remarkable Church Building in the World, Planned for Pittsburg

One of the most difficult problems in the Christian Church to-day is that of the city. The migrations are so rapid, the march of the people away from the business districts for places of residence so constant that it is becoming more and more difficult to sustain the downtown churches, and hence immensely valuable sites are disposed of and the proceeds invested in church plants in residential districts. A certain amount of this kind of work is necessary; but many good judges think that the matter has been overdone, and that it is the duty of the various denominations to keep a certain number of downtown churches for the benefit of many who cannot live farther out, or do not desire to do so, and which may be centres of evangelism to the floating population. If this shall be the case, people of large means must maintain these churches as mission posts, or some form of endowment must be provided for them. The experiment of these people in Pittsburg may help in the solution of the difficult problem. The business part of their building may furnish ample support for the ministerial supply and other expenses of the church organization, and also provide a generous fund for outside benevolences. The ideal form of church support is, of course, the voluntary contributions of the worshipers of the individual society. But with these churches in the business districts of cities, such a thing is impossible, and it may be that this proposition to make the ground help carry the church will prove a practical one. The Catholics are very slow to surrender any of their downtown churches, and Protestantism will have to set itself to the solution of the important question with greater wisdom and consecration.

He shall build a house for my name. (II. Sam. 7 · 13.)

Another Fatal "Joy" Ride

A wild "joy" ride in an automobile, taken from a New York garage without the owner's knowledge, resulted in a crash in which Matthew Camp, the driver, a demonstrator for the Moon Motor Car Company, was crushed to death and Joseph Fogarty was probably fatally injured. When the machine, going at a terrific speed, struck a tree in the west drive of Central Park, near Sixty-third Street, Camp's body was pinned to the tree by the parts of the automobile and in unutterable agony he begged them to put him out of his pain. He died while they were extricating him from the wreck. Frye, Fogarty and Horl, who were also in the car at the time of the accident, were removed to Flower Hospital. These four men drank a considerable amount of whisky in a saloon at Thirteenth Street and Broadway, where they staid for three hours, and then in their drunken frenzy dashed along the highway, taking the lives of their fellowmen, as well as their own, in their hands. This accident lacks the female companions who are usually present on such rides. We have recorded here another of the many tragedies resulting from the gratification of an evil appetite and the reckless pursuit of joys which end in death.

Then sudden destruction cometh upon them. (I. Thess. 5 : 3.)

Built House on the Wrong Lot

Harold W. Dangler, of Brooklyn, owns a piece of property in Arlington, N. J. Mr. Clarkson, a contractor of that place, by some mistake in surveying or description of deed, erected a handsome $3,000 real estate building upon his neighbor's lot. When the building was finished Clarkson discovered that Dangler owned the property. The Walker Bros. Lumber Company, of Arlington, which had furnished material for the building, filed a lien against Dangler's property. The case was tried before Judge Black in Hackensack, N. J., and the jury was directed to find a verdict for the defendant, Mr. Dangler. This they did, and as a result the lumber company is out the price of the building material and the contractor has lost his labor and Mr. Dangler has possession of a house for which he paid nothing. Clarkson can, of course, pull the building down, or, if it be made entirely of wood, he can remove it from the premises. It seems that there might be some compromise with Dangler by which the loss might be divided. The hardship was the result of a mistake upon the part of Clarkson.

People in this world must suffer the consequences of mistakes as well as their wilful misdeeds. It was the business of the man to find out the ground he owned, and keep his eye on the place where his house was built. The want of caution in moral and religious matters brings no end of trouble. We have no business, even carelessly, to build our structures on any ground that would render them valueless.

But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon. (I. Cor. 3 : 10.)

Elephants Going to Bed

At midnight, in the circus at Madison Square Garden in New York, preparations are made to put the animals of the show to bed and, when the lights are put out in the respective departments, these creatures go to bed and go to sleep as sweetly and almost as noiselessly as children do. Now and then there is a sick animal, which makes a noise that starts the howls and screeches of the whole menagerie, but from midnight until daylight things are comparatively quiet. The crowd is liable to take a last look at the elephants and their bedtime is delayed about an hour. A midnight meal is provided, comprised of several tons of hay, with a mixture of 600 bushels of bran and seven bushels of oats as an appetizer. These ingredients are mixed on a big sheet as mortar would be mixed, shoveled into wheelbarrows and emptied in front of each elephant, who devours them greedily, taking about five minutes for his pleasant task. A barrel of water is given to each elephant as a final drink and then the lights go out and the elephants of their own accord go to bed. They lie down with their feet to the wall and close against each other, side by side, but the strangest part of the whole performance is the fact that they will not go to sleep until certain members of the colony have been appointed to watch while the rest enjoy their slumber. Of the twenty-three elephants at the Garden three of their number are selected to watch; one at each end of the line and one in the middle. When the three have watched about half the night, each pokes the body of the one nearest to him with his trunk and they get up and make room for the three watchers to sleep for the rest of the night. This guard duty is performed all the year round, so faithful keepers say. The watchers stand eating their hay, with their little eyes watching in every direction for any danger that might appear. It is said that in their native jungles they have this guard duty performed to save them from the enemies that would pounce upon them and injure or destroy them, and that this instinct clings to them in captivity.

The action of these animals illustrates the necessity of eternal vigilance upon the part of the Church of Jesus Christ, and upon the part of the individual Christian, that they be protected against the disturbance and destruction of their spiritual foes.

And what I say unto you I say unto all, watch. (Mark 13 : 37.)

MISSIONARIES KILLED BY MOSLEMS

STARTLING MASSACRES OF ARMENIANS IN ASIA MINOR

DISPATCHES from Constantinople bring intelligence of a fanatical Mohammedan uprising in several cities of Asia Minor, which resulted in terrible massacres of Armenians and other Christians. Massacres took place at Adana, Marash, Tarsus and Antioch. At Adana, two American missionaries, D. Miner Rogers and Dr. Maurer, were shot dead by the rioters on April 15, while they were endeavoring to extinguish a fire in the house of an aged Turkish woman. It is not known whether the shooting was accidental or deliberate. Mr. Rogers was a missionary of the American Board and was appointed to his post at Adana less than two years ago. He is survived by a widow and one child. He came from New Britain, Conn., and married Miss Christie, daughter of Rev. Thomas D. Christie, for many years the president of St. Paul's Institute, Tarsus, Asiatic Turkey. Rev. Henry Maurer was also an American missionary and was supported by the Mennonite Brethren in Christ, of Elkhart County, Indiana. He was in charge of a school at Hadjin, Turkey. Mr. Maurer had been in Turkey three years. His wife was a Miss Hawley, who was also attached to the mission.

Ministers and Christian Converts of the Adana Mission

1. Rev. Dr. Merrill 2. Rev. Peter Bedross 3. Pastor Hampardzoom

At Adana the rioting had been going on for several days before it finally assumed a formidable aspect. Many buildings belonging to Armenians and non-Mussulmans were burned by incendiaries, and armed bands of Mohammedans attacked the helpless people, killing many of them. One estimate places the number of dead and wounded in Adana alone at 5,000. Many other towns and villages suffered. Twenty were killed at Marash, but the authorities there soon subdued the rioters. The number of victims at Tarsus is unknown, but it is reported that there are at least 1,000 victims there and at Alexandretta. Mersina, Kharput and Aleppo also report disturbances of a similar nature and there are other evidences that the rising has been an extensive one. Massacres are feared at Erzeroum and Beirut. Several of the places named were scenes of slaughter and suffering during the great Armenian massacres some years ago. This is the first occasion in modern times in which disturbances have occurred in Tarsus, the native city of Paul.

Daniel Miner Rogers
Killed in the Adana riots

There is a panic in many places in Northern Syria and Asia Minor, and it is impossible to tell how many have already fallen in the anti-Christian riots. Thousands of refugees are pouring into Alexandretta, and there are ominous rumors that 10,000 have been slaughtered in the Adana and Tarsus districts and that scores of villages are now a smoking ruin.

France, Great Britain and Italy are sending warships to the Asia Minor seaports for the protection of foreigners and to aid in the restoration of order. The American Consul at Mersina attempted to reach Adana, but all means of travel were cut off. Many Armenian farms near Alexandretta have been raided, the stock seized or destroyed and the occupants killed or driven off. The missionaries at Adana are practically captives in the mission compound, which they do not dare to leave. They sent an appeal to the military authorities for protection, but unavailingly. They are suffering from lack of provisions and medicines. Unless substantial aid comes soon they will be in a position of the gravest peril. It is hoped, however, that the worst is over. It is learned that two American warships, the cruisers Montana and North Carolina, are now on the way to Alexandretta. In the troubled section there are a number of American missionaries, and until our ships arrive French and English vessels will afford protection to American life and property. Among the mission workers believed to be in Tarsus at the present time are Miss Elizabeth and Adele Brewer, sisters of Associate Justice Brewer of the United States Supreme Court.

Missionary Secretary Peet, of the American Board at Constantinople, has cabled to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD appealing for relief for the destitute at Adana and Tarsus, who are believed to number many thousands. Medicines and food are needed for these unfortunates who, in a majority of cases, are both penniless and homeless, their dwellings having been destroyed by the fanatical incendiaries. In response to Mr. Peet's appeal, Dr. Klopsch immediately cabled $250 to be used for urgent cases where needed. Any contributions sent to this journal for this purpose will be promptly forwarded and will also be acknowledged in these columns.

At this writing appeals for help are being received from many sources. Miss Rose Lambert, one of the Mennonite missionaries at Hadjin, sent a message saying that city was surrounded by fanatics who threatened to storm it and were already firing shots into the place. Antioch's Armenian population was wiped out. Great multitudes are starving, and thousands are flocking to Adana. At Ayas, near Alexandretta, the criminals were released from jail, and joined the rioters in massacre and pillage. Kirikan, southeast of Alexandretta, was sacked and burned and all the Christians in the place ruthlessly massacred, even the babies.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—EVANGELISTS HART AND MAGANN, of Fairbury, Ill., recently closed a union tabernacle revival meeting with the six Protestant churches of Naperville, Ill. The large tabernacle erected for the meetings was filled nightly, and nearly 700 professions occurred.

—A FAR-REACHING revival has been in progress in Tampa, Fla., the last three weeks. The revivalist, John B. Culpepper, and his son, Rev. Burke Culpepper, have labored with much success. Their great tent has been filled with attentive hearers morning, afternoon and evening. At the First M. E. Church, South, their meetings for workers have had a most uplifting influence. Special services for children, business men, motormen and street car conductors have been features of the revival.

—THE MISSIONARY SPIRIT holds first place in Trinity Epworth League, Denver, Colo. At a recent meeting Rev. Dr. Louis Albert Banks (well-known to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers) was the speaker. At the close seven professed conversion. The League wins on an average fifty souls a year. It conducts services at the county jail Sunday mornings. Twenty-one conversions have taken place there. Trinity League is educating four children in Palestine, supplies two native preachers in the Philippines and a Bible woman in China, and it is educating two Chinese orphans, at $25 a year each.

—THE NATIONAL FEDERATION of Gospel Missions, which had its birth through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, recently held in Philadelphia, Pa., a convention where more than fifty missionaries from all parts of the United States reported conditions in their several fields. These reports, taken verbatim, are collected into one volume of a hundred pages. A mission directory of the United States is included in the same volume, and the aim and objects of the Federation are clearly portrayed. The volume is 6x9 inches, and to cover cost of publication and postage will be sent to any address on receipt of 25 cents, by T. L. Fretz, vice-president, 1822 North Marvine Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

—ANTIGO, WIS., has been greatly stirred by a series of revival meetings conducted by Evangelist A. Edwin Burrows, of Youngstown, O. Special prayer meetings were started early in the winter. As a direct result of the revival two hundred and sixteen persons professed conversion, and the larger part of this number has since been gathered into the churches. The young people started cottage prayer meetings and began earnest work. A Bible club was organized among the high school boys. The revival fire spread to the churches, and on the last Sunday twenty-seven children professed conversion in the Baptist Church. The churches have taken on new life and the whole city has been raised to a higher standard of morals.

—THIRTY-TWO YEARS' work by Christian missionaries among the Sac and Fox Indians, on the Musquakie Reservation, Iowa, has brought forth some results. At the last meeting at the mission building three "bucks" professed to have been converted to Christianity, and the missionary in charge, having faith in their declarations, received these first converts into the Church.

—EVANGELIST E. L. CHAMBERLIN, who has been working among the mining camps of the Black Hills, is conducting a successful series of union meetings at Bancroft, Ia.

—AT PITTSBURG, KAN., lately, while the Biederwolf revival was going on, there was a remarkable night parade at the close of a meeting. The line extended several blocks in each direction from the tabernacle and on the side streets. The column was headed by mounted police, led by the chief, and following them were members of the city council in automobiles. Then came the ladies of the revival chorus, in white; the tabernacle ushers, the personal workers; the G. A. R., marching under "Old Glory"; the business men, the lodges and fraternal organizations; men from factories and industrial plants, carrying banners; a cornet band; coal miners, wearing lighted pit-lamps on their hats; railroad men, the tabernacle chorus, students of the high school and the State Manual Training Normal and the local business college. Following these came the pastors, and bringing up the rear marched the people of the churches. One section was made up of converts, and it was the most enthusiastic in the line. Residents decorated and lighted up their homes, and red-fire was burned at intervals. The streets were lined with people. When the parade disbanded all who could crowded into the tabernacle and the meeting lasted until close to midnight. Many of the paraders were led to accept Christ.

THE STORY OF MARCO

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

CHAPTER III

In the Widow Martin's Home

THERE came a day when Marco Ferdinando Bonelli did not appear in the Gaylordville streets. He was back in the little gray tent, crying—alone.

Just what to do with Marco, Gaylordville did not know. It boasted of no orphan asylum, no foundlings' home. There was little in Gaylordville but the mines and the silk mills; and the people were poor. Marco himself thought that he would better go and find his sister. He wanted Flossie, anyway. He said she was the only one who would understand—she and the violin. But to this Gaylordville objected. It had been six weeks since the gipsies went away, and to send a nine-year-old boy afoot and alone after them was not to be thought of for an instant. Somewhere in the stunted, warped, coal-begrimed heart of Gaylordville, the little motherless boy had found a tender spot. At least Gaylordville in a way claimed him, and bestirred itself as to his welfare.

It was just here that a most extraordinary thing occurred: the Widow Martin came forward and said that she would take the boy; and with a puzzled but relieved sigh, Gaylordville promptly handed over to her Marco Ferdinando Bonelli, and said that she was welcome to him.

The Widow Martin already had four mouths to feed besides her own, and for a woman who "did not like boys, nor tramps, nor gipsies," her action was certainly surprising. But there had been many a time during the last few weeks that the boy had stopped before her door and played; and though the music seldom brought her to the sight of the player, yet some of its old witchery must have entered into her soul, for never was she far from a half-opened door or window, where she would stand behind sheltering curtain or blind, until the last strain had died into silence far down the street.

To Marco himself this invitation of the Widow Martin's was not strange in the least. The Widow Martin was his good friend. Was it not she who had come to his assistance, and enabled him to fight that jeering mob of boys? And was it not she who had given him his first coin for his mother? To be sure it was. And to the Widow Martin's he went.

"It won't be for long, anyhow," he told her confidently. "I'm goin' ter play my fiddle and earn lots of money. Part of it I'll pay ter you for my board and keep, and the rest I'll save ter find Flossie with. You know I'm goin' ter find Flossie first thing, right away."

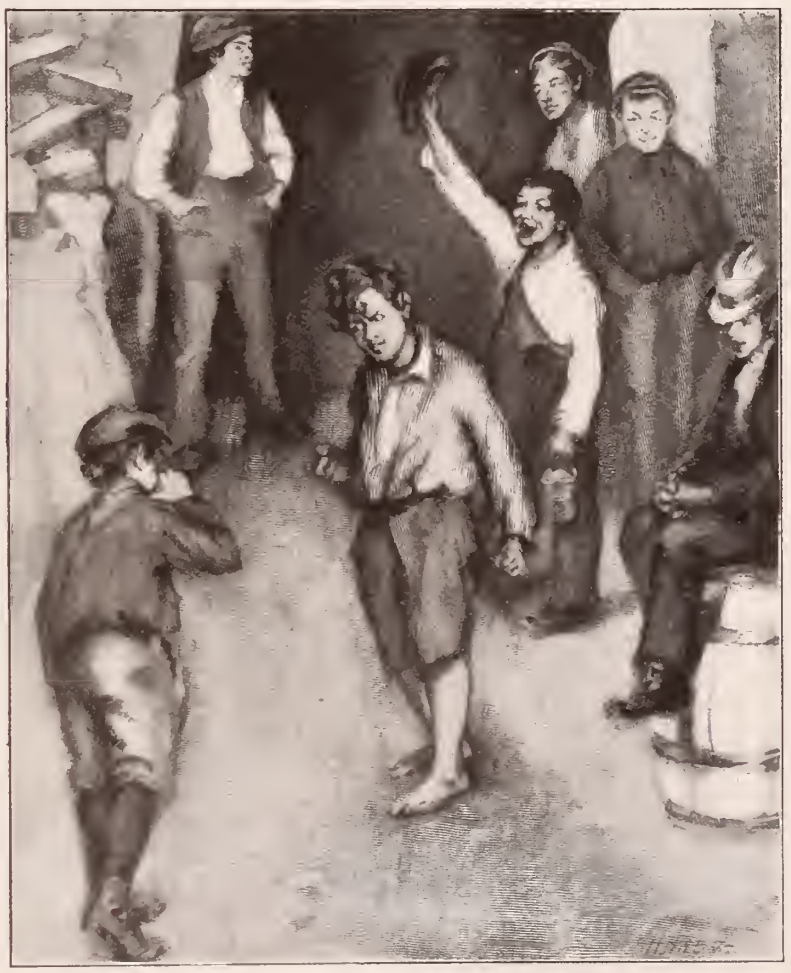
It was on a warm August evening that Marco was introduced to his new home. The Widow Martin's family were at supper—if supper it might be called—those scraps and odds and ends of bread and meat and boiled potatoes. As for the family: first, there was the Widow Martin herself, tall, gaunt, and weary-eyed; then there were Benny, fourteen; Susie, twelve, and Johnny, who was just past ten, besides Grandpa Joe, who was—indeed, nobody knew how old. He looked to be a hundred.

To the lonely little lad who had been crying his heart out in the silent, empty tent, this group looked very inviting; and with a long sigh he mentally took the entire family to his heart.

"I'm glad I've come," he said aloud, with a wistful smile. "I'm awful glad I've come."

Marco began work the next morning. In this he was not alone, for all the Martins—except the widow—went to work, too, the next morning—though with them it was not the beginning, for even little Johnny had already been at work some months. Benny was inside the mine—a "door tender." To be sure, the law said that Benny should not work under ground in an anthracite mine until he was sixteen. But the law was of small consequence to Benny or to Benny's mother. Benny could get four whole dollars and a half a week tending door, and that four dollars and a half was needed. Besides, as for the law, did he not have a certificate swearing that he was past sixteen? To be sure he did. Both Benny and Benny's mother were much too wary to be caught without that. And Benny knew how old he was, too, when people—interfering, inquisitive people—asked his age. He was "past sixteen" always—and he had been for a year.

Johnny was a breaker-boy. His work was in the huge building that towered above the shaft, through which the cars of coal were hoisted from that pit of blackness hundreds of feet below. Johnny had wanted to go down into that pit to work. The danger was greater—but so was the pay; and Johnny was ambitious—or he had been when he first went to work. But even he knew that his dwarfed little body would hardly answer for the "past sixteen" certificates; and that it was as much as he could do to obtain the one that would swear he was "past fourteen," and thus eligible to the position of breaker-boy. Johnny was not ambitious now. Nine hours a day of bending over a grinding stream of coal in the dust and roar of the coal-breaker, is not conducive to the increase of ambition, and Johnny was becoming more dull-eyed and stoop-shouldered every day. Still he worked, and worked well; and every week a portion of the pittance he earned went to swell the fund in the tin coffeepot—the wonderful coffeepot which held the money that would one day take them all away from the mines, and drop them on the green hillsides of the New Hampshire town where mother was born—and each of the family, except Grandpa Joe, contributed every week, if possible, a coin to the coffeepot's wealth. Grandpa Joe—Grandpa Joe did not earn much anyway; and what he did—went for drink.



"Hi, thar!—if here ain't Bonesy, de fiddlin' kid!"

Grandpa Joe was the late Bill Martin's father, and he was a breaker "boy," too, now. Grandpa Joe had been "mighty lucky," so the men said. In all the long fifty years of his work in mines, neither powder-blast nor fire-damp had laid him low, nor had falling rock or a broken rope taken life or limb. He was gray, bent, and shaken; but he was alive, and he could work; and he did work beside his ten-year-old grandson in the coal-breaker. And the cycle of one more miner's life was almost complete.

As for Susie—Susie was a girl, and "no good" for the mines. There had been a time, indeed, when girls in Gaylordville were at a discount; but that time was not now. Some one had noted the superfluous girls in mining towns, and had looked out for them—and incidentally for himself. Hence to Gaylordville had come the silk mills, the beneficent silk mills, which could employ any number of girls, sixteen years old, fifteen, fourteen, even younger—much younger; for, as in the case of the boys in the coal-breaker, Pennsylvania girls had only to be fourteen—on paper. And Susie was fourteen—on paper; so Susie worked in the mills.

The Widow Martin worked there, too, when she could; though her daily task of preparing for her family something to eat and something to wear was no small thing. Still, there was that hoard in the coffeepot, and the dear use to which it was one day to be put. But it grew so slowly—so woefully slowly! Sometimes it seemed as if its purpose would never be accomplished. To the Widow Martin, however, it was always something for which to live. There was always in the future that blessed day when she, with her children, would leave the squat, coal-begrimed shanties, with their swarms of jabbering foreigners, and look once more on the green hills of her childhood. And yet, in the face of all these hopes and struggles, she had taken into her home one more to feed and clothe—the little Marco Ferdinando Bonelli, late of the gipsy camp.

CHAPTER IV

A New Breaker Boy

MARCO, with his violin under his arm, went forth very bravely that first day, and began to play in the streets. But Marco, the little tramp boy to whom the Widow Martin had given a home, was

How to Deal With Idolatry*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

WE study to-day events which occurred in the cities of Iconium, Lystra and Derbe, all situated in Asia Minor. Iconium was a large and rich city, about fifty miles southeast of Antioch in Pisidia. There were many temples in Iconium, but not one for the worship of the true God. The house of God was a small synagogue, belonging to the fugitive Jews who had taken refuge in Iconium.

Lystra was a city of considerable size, about forty miles southeast of Iconium. There was no temple for the worship of the true God in Lystra, but a magnificent one for the idol god, Jupiter, and lesser ones for minor deities. A great statue of Jupiter stood at the very gate of entrance to the city. There was probably not even a synagogue in Lystra.

Derbe was a city twenty miles southeast of Lystra. Although heathenism prevailed in Derbe, there must have been some God-fearing people there, as it was the birthplace of Timothy, to whom Paul afterward wrote: "The unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice."

All of these cities were in existence in 46 A.D., at which time the events we are to study occurred.

The persons about whom we are to study are Paul and Barnabas; Jews and Greeks in the three cities, some of whom became converts to Christianity while others were rebellious; a cripple in Lystra; the Lycaonians, who were idol worshipers, and a priest of Jupiter.

The Healing of the Cripple

What these persons did we are to learn. Paul and Barnabas, being expelled from Antioch in Pisidia by Jews who would not accept Christ, came to Iconium, and in the synagogue they preached the Gospel of Jesus Christ. It is said that a great multitude, both of Jews and Greeks, believed; but there were others who would not believe, and these stirred up a mob, determined on stoning Paul and Barnabas. Then they left Iconium and came to Lystra. There they preached the Gospel in the market place. There was one person who listened so attentively that he attracted the attention of Paul. He was a man crippled from his birth, and known by everybody in Lystra. Paul discerned that he had faith to be healed, and, using the power which God had given him, Paul said in a loud voice, "Stand upright on thy feet." And the man straightway leaped up and began to walk. The Lystrans, Lycaonians, were astonished, and exclaimed that their gods had come down. Barnabas they took to be Jupiter, and Paul, Mercury; and they showed their intention to worship them. The priest of Jupiter brought forward an ox for sacrifice, and garlands of flowers with which to decorate their gods. But Paul and Barnabas disclaimed being gods, and asserted vigorously that they were only men like themselves. And even then it was hard to make the Lystrans desist from offering sacrifice to them.

But the wind does not change more quickly than the voice of the people, for within a very few hours those who had desired to honor them had joined hands with the turbulent Jews who had followed Paul and Barnabas all the way from Antioch and Iconium, with murderous intent, and as a result of their stoning Paul lay as one dead just outside of Lystra, where he had been dragged by those determined to kill him—for what?—for preaching the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

But God strengthened Paul, and even while his friends stood about mourning him as one dead he arose and went back into Lystra, where he remained until the next day.

Leaving Lystra, Paul and Barnabas came to Derbe, and preached the Gospel in that city, making many converts, among them young Timothy, whom he afterwards called "my own son in the faith" (I. Tim. 1:2).

After finishing their mission in Derbe, Paul and Barnabas revisited Lystra, Iconium and Antioch, that they might strengthen the converts they had left in those cities, and by more preaching add to their numbers.

Why are the events named recorded in the Holy Scriptures? We have God's Word for it that "Every Scripture inspired of God is profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness" (R. V.). Then let each individual Bible student try to discover what he may gain to help him in any, or in all, of these ways from the visits of Paul and Barnabas to Iconium, Lystra and Derbe. A skilful teacher (Peloubet) puts it in this way:

Acts 14:1: Blessed are those teachers who so present the Gospel that many believe. Verse 2: In order to do this we must first experience the Gospel, must see Jesus himself, must be filled with his spirit, must receive the Holy Ghost. Verse 3: Opposition is sometimes a reason why we should keep on doing the Lord's work. Verse 4: The world is ever divided by the Gospel into two parties. Blessed are those who stand on the side of right. Verse 6: If we cannot serve God in one place, we should go to another where we can. Verses 8 to 10: The Gospel is ever lending a helping hand to those who need. Whenever there is true faith, the blessing is sure to follow.

Verses 14, 15: The true teacher always draws attention to his Master, not to himself. Verse 19: Note the strange activity of bad men in a bad cause. Verse 20: God preserves in all dangers those for whom he has still work to do. Verse 21: The churches need line upon line, and precept upon precept. Verse 22: When men are converted the work is but begun. Men are confirmed in the faith: (1) By exhortation and example; (2) by continuing in the life and work they have begun; (3) by enduring trials; (4) by organized work and worship.

Fame Is a Bubble

A bubble is the thing of a moment; it is formed rapidly, it is a thing of beauty, it bursts, a damp spot is upon the floor, even that presently disappears, and the bubble is no more! Men struggle to form for themselves a bubble of fame; so mad is this desire to have one's name on everybody's lips, and in the public print, that some will even make themselves infamous to become famous.

On September 30, 1863, there died in a little town of Alsace an idiotic beggar woman. She was an object of curiosity to those who knew her strange history, whose one crowning moment of insane excitement she was never tired of telling to her visitors. For this woman was the very one whom the godless mob, in the days of the French Revolution, had elevated to be their "Goddess of Reason." On that day she had sat on the altar of Notre Dame, clad in white robes, ornamented with a blue mantle and red cap, and holding a pike in her hand. There she had mocked at Christ, and there she had been hailed as the new deity who

Would you like to accomplish these results by natural means and in a scientific, dignified manner?

I have helped over 30,000 women in the past six years by a few simple directions followed in the privacy of their own rooms.

Too Fleshy? I can reduce you and at the same time strengthen stomach and heart, and relieve you of such chronic ailments as:

Constipation	Rheumatism	Dullness	Sleeplessness
Torpid Liver	Weakness	Irritability	Weak Nerves
Indigestion	Catarrh	Nervousness	Weak Heart

I strengthen whatever organs are weak; start your blood to circulating as when you were a child; teach you to breathe so the blood is fully purified.

One Pupil Writes:

"Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I have reduced those hips and I feel so well I want to shout. I never get out of breath now. When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all so easy. I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

Too Thin? You can be round, plump, rested and attractive. Nature intended you to be, why should you not?

A pupil who was thin writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I want it, and I carry myself like another woman. My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion any more, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel so well all the time."

Write me today telling me your faults in health or figure, and I will cheerfully tell you whether I can help you.

was to redeem France. What a pathetic commentary on the folly of sin was seen in the beggar woman—old, idiotic, blind, dying in want.

George Eliot was much distressed and much surprised to hear her works called depressing. She seldom read notices of her books, but an English writer says: "We recall a quaint and pathetic outburst of disappointment" at their producing on some critic "a tendency toward black despair." Nevertheless, she gave always the impression that one of the greatest duties of life was resignation. "Fame promises in gold and pays in silver," said George Eliot to a literary friend.

The only kind of fame that is not like a bubble, but will last throughout eternity, is that which comes from linking ourselves with Christ, and doing good to others "in his name." The fame of the woman who poured the contents of the rose-jar upon the head of Jesus, and then sat at his feet, has reached into every part of the world. Jesus himself said it should be so (Matt. 26:13). Paul was undoubtedly the most famous preacher the world has ever known.

Idolatry Is an Abomination

We who live in a Christian land all agree upon this. When in Peking, China, we visited what is called "The Eighteen Hells," a part of the famous "Yellow Temple." The "hells" are stalls, and there are nine or ten figures in each stall, representing devils in most hideous mien, great popping eyes, and teeth like fangs. They are flaying people alive, sawing off heads, tying and twisting legs and arms, reproducing medieval forms of persecuting criminals, with the additional idea of hell. We saw people prostrating themselves in front of the devils, imploring mercy for their sins. But a Chinese boy who was following us around, probably to see the impression made upon us, slyly shrugged his shoulders and looked at us out of the corners of his eyes and had a broad grin on his face. The action of that boy is typical of the growing disregard of idols in China. In fact, the temples are rapidly being cleared of idols, to be used as schoolhouses; particularly is this so in the city of Tien-Tsin.
